May I digress for a moment to state that I believe it is unfortunate that so many men were taken from the farms, resulting in such an acute shortage of labor that many of our farmers will be unable to produce the food that is so essential in winning this war. I am not advocating exemption for the farmer, but I believe more of them should have had furloughs to return home from time to time to assist in the planting and harvesting.

As I was saying, these men have been taken from their homes, trained to forget everything they were formerly concerned with, and will do nothing perhaps for three or four years except those things that are in keeping with the life of a soldier.

The men who come home safe and sound of limb will find it a considerable task to adjust themselves to their former prewar conditions. That being true, we may to some extent realize the difficulties of rehabilitation for the man who has been injured or crippled and the urgent need for his early education. He perhaps was wounded in the front-line trenches and has endured every hardship and discomfort a mortal can think of. Surely, my colleagues, we are all ready to assume the burden of his reeducation. We want him and his family to receive all the benefits from his war-risk insurance, and I know that he will want his Government to assist and educate him in some manner so that he may again become a useful and independent citizen.

In former wars it was thought sufficient to grant pensions to our crippled soldiers and sailors. In many cases, as the pension was insufficient to support him and owing to the character of the injury he was unable to secure employment at his former occupation, and in consequence thereof was often an object of charity.

Fort Porter, in my district, is now being utilized as one of the 17 temporary rehabilitation hospitals or schools that this bill provides for; and in talking to a physician a short time ago, I was informed that they have a number of soldiers stationed there who are actually being built over or reconstructed, so to speak, and I was told by the surgeon that the plan is not to release the soldier until he has been made a new man. If he has lost both legs, they are going to put two new legs on him and train him thoroughly to walk and to use those legs. If he has lost both arms, they are going to put new arms on him and train him thoroughly to use them.

This physician also related a very interesting story of a soldier in an English hospital who had both legs amputated, one hand entirely gone, and all the fingers gone from the other hand. He assured me it was almost impossible to detect the fact that this man had been injured.

I do not believe it is generally known that we are bringing our wounded and crippled soldiers back in considerable numbers at the present time. Our large casualty list for the past few days will add very rapidly to the number of men in our hospitals, and I know every Member of Congress is prepared to vote for this bill and to give the Government the necessary funds and power to carry out the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. HICKS. I do so in order to ask another question of the chairman in charge of the bill, and I hope he does not think I am inflicting myself too much on the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very sure that any information I can give will be gladly given.

Mr. HICKS. I thank the gentleman. I notice running all through this bill that the masculine gender is used, and reference is continually made to "him" and "his." I have no doubt the committee has investigated this subject, but I want to call attention to it in case they have not. In the Navy to-day we have probably a thousand women enlisted as nurses. Assume, for instance, that some of these women are injured in their hospitals and that they can no longer carry on their work as nurses. According to the wording of this bill those women, I take it, would not be allowed to take this training, since by the words "him" and "his" only men come under the purview of this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman in mind the women who are in the Army and Navy service who may receive the benefits of the war-risk insurance act?

Mr. HICKS. Exactly so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that is true, undoubtedly they would come within the purview of this bill. It says "any person."

Mr. HICKS. I understand that definition is used in the first part of the bill, but later "him" and "his" are used, and I do not want women in the service excluded from the benefits of this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In legal construction the word "he" covers both male and female.

Mr. HICKS. Remember the comptroller is very technical. Here is another thing to which I would like to call attention. On page 6, line 4 the term "soldier and sailor" is used. The question in my mind is whether or not that would confine the operation of this bill to soldiers and sailors exclusively and would prevent women nurses and men in the Coast Guard from taking the training. I do not know. Of course, if those words are used generically it would meet the objection, but as the gentleman knows, we have in the armed service of the United States members of the Coast Guard, men who are technically neither soldiers nor sailors, yet fighting under the flag. Would they come within the purview of this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do they come within the purview of the war-insurance act?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, in my opinion, they would come within the purview of this bill, because this bill, as you will see if you will look at the beginning of it, provides "that every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under article 3 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,'" and so forth. After they are discharged they are eligible to receive this treatment.

Mr. HICKS. I read that, and I imagined that that would answer the point I brought up, but I wondered why it was that the specific term "soldier and sailor," instead of the general term "enlisted man," was used. But so long as the point is covered and the Coast Guard is included, I have no further inquiry to make.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If they are covered by the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, they are covered by this bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I notice in this war-risk insurance act, in article 3, page 8, provision is made for any member of the Army Nurse Corps, "female" in brackets, or of the Navy Nurse Corps, "female" in brackets. Now, what I have in mind is, will this cover the class of women known as "yeomen," or "yeowomen," enlisted women in the Navy? There are a lot of them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to my friend that I am not familiar with all the details of the war-risk insurance act so as to know whether yeowomen would come under this provision or not.

Mr. McKENZIE. They are clerks.

Mr. ROBBINS. If these yeowomen are clerks, of course they would be exposed to danger and they might lose their lives in the service of their country in line of duty, just as men might lose their lives on a torpedoed ship.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that no woman is permitted to go on a battleship at any time, and that these yeomen or yeowomen in the Navy are women employed in clerical positions in the city of Washington and roundabout the navy yards of the country?

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not able to answer that question. That is the reason why I asked the question of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman's question whether or not these yeowomen would be covered by this provision in the vocational training bill?

Mr. ROBBINS. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say that if the war-risk insurance bill covers the yeowomen they would be included in this bill. Otherwise this bill applies only to those, male and female, who are entitled to the benefits of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. ROBBINS. It applies to the Nurse Corps.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, just before coming to the House to-day I received a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relating to the general subject of preparation of plans to provide opportunities for soldiers returning from the war; and I ask unanimous consent to read the letter at this time, because, in a measure, it relates to the subject matter of the bill now before us.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman mean to read all of that letter that we all received this morning from the Secretary?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not all have received it. I have asked a number of Members and each said that he had not received a copy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think every Member has received a copy. It is rather lengthy. I would be glad to have it published in the RECORD, but it is rather lengthy.

Mr. HENSLEY. It is already in the RECORD.

Mr. DUPRÉ. No. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] objected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; the gentleman from Washington objected to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Interior, in the letter referred to by my colleague, speaks of a survey. If there is any objection to the gentleman proceeding, I may say that in the consideration of the sundry civil bill the matter will be strictly pertinent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of all the bills which have come before Congress since this war began none has had a nobler purpose than that of the pending measure. Indeed, the only other bill which in that respect could be compared with the pending measure is the one to establish war-risk insurance. Although this bill contains features to which gentlemen object, yet it will, of course, pass without opposition.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a letter concerning the preparation of plans for providing an opportunity for our soldiers returning from the war—a letter addressed to me by the Secretary of the Interior. It is a thoughtful, statesmanlike production.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

"THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
"Washington, May 31, 1918.

"MY DEAR MR. COOPER: I believe the time has come when we should give thought to the preparation of plans for providing opportunity for our soldiers returning from the war. Because this department has handled similar problems I consider it my duty to bring this matter to the attention of yourself and Congress.

"Every country has found itself face to face with this situation at the close of a great war. From Rome, under Cæsar, to France, under Napoleon, down even to our own Civil War the problem arose as to what could be done with the soldiers to be mustered out of military service.

"At the close of the Civil War America faced a somewhat similar situation. But fortunately at that time the public domain offered opportunity to the home-returning soldiers. The great part the veterans of that war played in developing the West is one of our epics. The homestead law had been signed by Lincoln in the second year of the war, so that out of our wealth in lands we had farms to offer the millions of veterans. It was also the era of transcontinental railway construction. It was likewise the period of rapid, yet broad and full, development of towns and communities and States.

"To the great number of returning soldiers land will offer the great and fundamental opportunity. The experience of wars points out the lesson that our service men because of army life, with openness and activity, will largely seek out-of-door vocations and occupations. This fact is accepted by the allied European nations. That is why their programs and policies of relocating and readjustment emphasize the opportunities on the land for the returning soldier. The question, then, is, 'What land can be made available for farm homes for our soldiers?'

"We do not have the bountiful public domain of the sixties and seventies. In a literal sense, for the use of it on a generous scale for soldier farm homes as in the sixties, 'the public domain is gone.' The official figures at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1917, shows this: We have unappropriated land in the continental United States to the amount of 230,657,755 acres. It is safe to say that not one-half of this land will ever prove to be cultivable in any sense. So we have no land in any way comparable to that in the public domain when Appomattox came, and men turned westward with army rifle and 'roll blanket' to begin life anew.

"While we do not have that matchless public domain of 1865, we do have millions of acres of undeveloped lands that can be made available for our home-coming soldiers. We have arid lands in the West; cut-over lands in the Northwest, Lake States, and South; and also swamp lands in the Middle West and South which can be made available through the proper development. Much of this land can be made suitable for farm homes if properly handled. But it will require that each type of land be dealt with in its own particular fashion. The arid land will require water, the cut-over land will require clearing, and the swamp land must be drained. Without any of these aids, they remain largely 'no man's land.' The solution of these problems is no new thing. In the admirable achievement of the Reclamation Service in reclamation and drainage we have abundant proof of what can be done.

"Looking toward the construction of additional projects, I am glad to say that plans and investigations have been under way for some time. A survey and study has been in the course of consummation by the Reclamation Service on the Great Colorado Basin. That great project, I believe, will appeal to the new spirit of America. It would mean the conquest of an empire in the Southwest. It is believed that more than 3,000,000 acres of arid land could be reclaimed by the completion of the upper and lower Colorado Basin projects.

"It has been officially estimated that more than 15,000,000 acres of irrigable land now remain in the Government's hands. This is the great remaining storehouse of Government land for reclamation. Under what policy and program millions of these acres could be reclaimed for future farms and homes remains for legislation to determine. The amount of swamp and cut-over lands in the United States that can be made available for farming is extensive. Just how much there is has never been determined with any degree of accuracy. Practically all of it has passed into private ownership. For that reason, in considering its use, it would be necessary to work out a policy between the private owners and the Government, unless the land was purchased. It has been estimated that the total area of swamp and overflowed lands in the United States is between seventy and eighty million acres. Of this amount, it is stated that about '60,000,000 acres can be reclaimed and made profitable for agriculture.' The undeveloped swamp lands lie chiefly in Florida, in the States along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, in the Mississippi Delta, and in Missouri, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and California.

"What amount of land in its natural state unfit for farm homes can be made suitable for cultivation by drainage only thorough surveys and studies can develop. We know that authentic figures show that more than 15,000,000 acres have been reclaimed for profitable farming, most of which lies in the Mississippi River Valley.

"The amount of cut-over lands in the United States, of course, it is impossible even in approximation to estimate. These lands, however, lie largely in the South Atlantic and Gulf States, the Lake States, and the Northwestern States. A rough estimate of their number is about 200,000,000 acres—that is, of land suitable for agricultural development. Substantially all this cut-over or logged-off land is in private ownership. The failure of this land to be developed is largely due to inadequate method of approach. Unless a new policy of development is worked out in cooperation between the Federal Government, the States, and the individual owners, a greater part of it will remain unsettled and uncultivated. The undeveloped cut-over lands lie chiefly in the Pacific Northwest, particularly in Washington and Oregon; in the Lake States, Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin; and in the South Atlantic and Gulf Coastal States, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas.

"Any plan for the development of land for the returning soldier will come face to face with the fact that a new policy will have to meet the new conditions. The era of free or cheap land in the United States has passed. We must meet the new conditions of developing lands in advance; security must to a degree displace speculation. Some of the defects in our old system have been described by Dr. Elwood Mead in these words:

"Science [should] have gone hand in hand with the settlement of the arid and semiarid country, and all that science could give would have been utilized—first, in the creation of the conditions of settlement, and then in aiding the settler in difficult tasks. Because nothing was done, these heroic but uninformed souls were bedeviled by the winds, cold, drought, and insect pests. They wasted their efforts, lost their hopes and ambitions, and a tragic percentage left, impoverished and embittered. The tragic part of this history is that nearly all this suffering and loss could have been avoided under a carefully thought-out plan of development.

"There are certain tendencies which we ought to face frankly in our consideration of a policy for land to the home-coming soldier: First, the drift to farm tenancy. The experience of the world shows without question that the happiest people, the best farms, and the soundest political conditions are found where the farmer owns the home and the farm lands. The growth of tenancy in America shows an increase of 32 per cent for the 20 years between 1890 and 1910. Second, the drift to urban life. In 1880, of the total population of the United States, 29.5 per cent of our people resided in cities and 70.5 per cent in the country. At the census of 1910, 46.3 per cent resided in cities and 53.7 per cent remained in the country. It is evident that since the war in Europe there has been a decided increase in the trend toward the city because of industrial conditions. The adoption by the United States of new policies in its land-development plans for returning veterans will also contribute to the amelioration of these two dangers to American life.

"A plan of land development, whereby land is developed in large areas, subdivided into individual farms, then sold to actual bona fide farmers on a long-time payment basis, has been in force not only in the United States under the reclamation act, but also in many other countries for several years. It has proved a distinct success. In Denmark, Ireland, New Zealand, and the Australian Commonwealth it has completely changed the land situation. One of the new features of this plan is that holders are aided in improving and cultivating the farm. In a word, there is organized community development. Its beneficial results have been well described by the Canadian commission which was appointed to investigate its results in New Zealand, in this these words:

"* * * the farmers have built better houses or remodeled their old ones, brought a larger acreage of land under cultivation that would otherwise be lying idle; have bought and kept better live stock; have bought and urged more labor-saving machinery on the farms and in the houses * * *. They keep more sheep and pigs, and have so largely increased the revenue from their farms that they are able to meet the payments on the mortgages and to adopt a higher standard of living, and a better one. Throughout the country a higher and better civilization is gradually being evolved; the young men and women who are growing up are happy and contented to remain at home on the farm and find ample time and opportunity for recreation and entertainment of a kind more wholesome and elevating than can be obtained in the cities.

"It may be said that this country outside of Alaska has no frontier to-day. Of course, Alaska will still offer opportunity for a pioneer life. And, of course, Alaska likewise has yet unknown remarkable agricultural possibilities, but unless we make possible the development of this land by the men who desire their life in that field, we will lose a great national opportunity.

"This is an immediate duty. It will be too late to plan for these things when the war is over. Our thought now should be given to the problem. And I therefore desire to bring to your mind the wisdom of immediately supplying the Interior Department with a sufficient fund with which to make the necessary surveys and studies. We should know by the time the war ends not merely how much arid land can be irrigated, nor how much swamp land reclaimed, nor where the grazing land is and how many cattle it will support, nor how much cut-over land can be cleared, but we should know with definiteness where it is practicable to begin new irrigation projects, what the character of the land is, what the nature of the improvements needed will be, and what the cost will be. We should know also, not in a general way but with particularity, what definite areas of swamp land may be reclaimed, how they can be drained, what the cost of the drainage will be, what crops they will raise. We should have in mind specific areas of grazing lands, with a knowledge of the cattle which are best adapted to them, and the practicability of supporting a family upon them. So, too, with our cut-over lands. We should know what it would cost to pull or 'blow out' stumps and to put the lands into condition for a farm home.

"And all this should be done upon a definite planning basis. We should think as carefully of each one of these projects as George Washington thought of the planning of the city of Washington. We should know what it will cost to buy these lands if they are in private hands. In short, at the conclusion of the war the United States should be able to say to its returned soldiers: 'If you wish to go upon a farm, here are a variety of farms of which you may take your pick, which the Government has prepared against the time of your returning.' I do not mean by this to carry the implication that we should do any other work now than the work of planning. A very small sum of money put into the hands of men of thought, experience, and vision will give us a program which will make us feel entirely confident that we are not to be submerged industrially or otherwise by labor which we will not be able to absorb, or that we would be in a condition where we would show a lack of respect for those who return as heroes, but who will be without means of immediate self-support.

"A million or two dollars, if appropriated now, will put this work well under way.

"This plan does not contemplate anything like charity to the soldier. He is not to be given a bounty. He is not to be made to feel that he is a dependent. On the contrary, he is to continue in a sense in the service of the Government. Instead of destroying our enemies he is to develop our resources.

"The work that is to be done, other than the planning, should be done by the soldier himself. The dam or the irrigation project should be built by him, the canals, the ditches, the breaking of the land, and the building of the houses should, under proper direction, be his occupation. He should be allowed to make his own home, cared for while he is doing it, and given an interest in the land for which he can pay through a long period of years, perhaps 30 or 40 years. This same policy can be carried out as to the other classes of land. So that the soldier on his return would have an opportunity to make a home for himself, to build a home with money which we would advance and which he would repay, and for the repayment we would have an abundant security. The farms should not be turned over as the prairies were—unbroken, unfenced, without accommodations for men or animals. There should be prepared homes, all of which can be constructed by the men themselves and paid for by them under a system of simple devising by which modern methods of finance will be applied to their needs.

"As I have indicated, this is not a mere Utopian vision. It is, with slight variations, a policy which other countries are pursuing successfully. The plan is simple. I will undertake to present to the Congress definite projects for the development of this country through the use of the returned soldier by which the United States, lending its credit, may increase its resources and its population and the happiness of its people, with a cost to itself of no more than the few hundred thousand dollars that it will take to study this problem through competent men. This work should not be postponed.

"Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

"Hon. H. A. COOPER,
"House of Representatives."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to receive such gifts and donations from either public or private sources as may be offered unconditionally. All moneys received as gifts or donations shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall constitute a permanent fund, to be called the "Special fund for vocational rehabilitation," to be used under the direction of the said board, in connection with the appropriations hereby made or hereafter to be made, to defray the expenses of providing and maintaining courses of vocational rehabilitation; and a full report of all gifts and donations offered and accepted, and all disbursements therefrom, shall be submitted annually to Congress by said board.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LONDON moves to amend by striking out all of section 7.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, during the general debate I indicated my opposition to this section. This bill is one of the most beneficent measures ever proposed. It admits the obligation of the Nation to its defenders, to those of them who may become incapacitated in the course of their service. The bill proposes to put them as far as is humanly possible in a position where they may be able to support themselves and become independent of charity.

It is doubtful whether the practice of charity in an organized form is a virtue. Organized charity usually presupposes the existence of a helpless mass of people and of other people who by reason of larger worldly possessions are able to throw a sop to their own consciences by giving something to charity, and with their consciences thus appeased continue all sorts and forms of exploitation. However, that is not to the point, and I have no time to go into that. This section, which I want to see stricken out, permits the acceptance of private gifts. What interests me now is that this fund, which is to be the reservoir of the conscience of the Nation, this appropriation which represents the expression of the will of the people that those who have suffered in defense of the country ought to be compensated out of the General Treasury, should not be replenished through private charity. I am opposed to the acceptance of private funds as contributions. I am opposed to the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation or any other large charitable organization claiming any share in the direction of this work by reason of a large contribution.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. FESS. There will be offered to the Government some hospitals already built.

Mr. LONDON. These hospitals already built should be accepted. They can be accepted in spite of the striking out of section 7 by paying a nominal consideration, just as we have accepted the services of men who are considered valuable by offering them a nominal compensation of $1. If you can accept the services of a valuable man by paying him a nominal consideration, you can accept a hospital worth millions of dollars by paying a nominal consideration.

Mr. FESS. There will be an altruistic movement started in the cities, which will also call for contributions.

Mr. LONDON. I understand all that; but does not the gentleman see the principle of my objection? This is in the form of a national payment, is it not?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. This bill contemplates a method of restoring to their former physical capacity the men who may be disabled in the course of fighting for the country. Why should the man who obtains support from that fund have to look to some individual millionaire contributor as his benefactor?

Mr. FESS. Why not accept the contribution if it is given unconditionally?

Mr. LONDON. And why should that millionaire claim a share in something which is the Nation's obligation?

Mr. FESS. If he wants to make the contribution, I do not see why we should not accept it.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the gentleman realize that some of these individuals who contribute large sums of money will necessarily be in a position to exercise some influence over the administration of that fund?

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman offer the same objection to contributions to the Red Cross?

Mr. LONDON. We will suppose that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] contributes $5,000,000 to this fund.

Mr. FESS. Please do not embarrass me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONDON. Now, the gentleman comes to the chairman of the board that is charged with the administration of this work. Immediately it will be said, "Why, this man has contributed $5,000,000." Of course the gentleman's word will go, particularly when it comes to the placement of people in various employments, as is provided in another section. We do not accept contributions to the pension fund and we do not accept contributions to the war-risk insurance fund, which is a modern adaptation of the principle of pensions, a modification in the light of modern knowledge of the principle of pensions. Now, this is a still further extension of the principle of compensation. It is really an extension of the principles of pensions and of war-risk insurance. If you do not accept private funds for pensions and if you do not accept private contributions to the war-risk insurance fund, there is no reason in the world why you should permit this sacred fund to be dominated by private contributions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman think the Red Cross is dominated by private contributions?

Mr. LONDON. No; the Red Cross fund is one of those things that appeals to the great masses of the people. As I indicated during my remarks in the course of the general debate, the principal work of the Red Cross will be the restoration of the devastated sections of France, Belgium, and Serbia that have been almost annihilated, and that work of the Red Cross will go far beyond the efforts of individuals, and will have to be undertaken as an obligation of the nations and of the governments.

Mr. McKENZIE. I assume that the gentleman from New York takes the position that the man with a large fortune has probably accumulated it at the expense of the masses of the people and therefore in a sense his money is tainted. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from New York which he would prefer, that that money accumulated by this gentleman who in a sense must be a bad man, should be given to a great cause like this, or that it should be handed down to his children, who might emulate the exemple of their father?

Mr. LONDON. I do not proceed on the theory that the rich man's money is tainted. The trouble is that among the common folks there are as many stupid and wicked men as among the rich. The rich man is simply utilizing the opportunities furnished him by existing laws and existing institutions. It does not follow that he is a bad man. The mere fact that he has millions does not indicate that he has acquired his money in a dishonest way, particularly when the generally prevailing code of morality permits it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. What does the gentleman mean by the accumulation of these men constituting contaminated money?

Mr. LONDON. Perhaps I used that expression, but let me say in what sense I used it. We have an extensive system of pensions. It is the recognition of the obligation of the Nation toward the individual. The gentleman must realize that in the matter of war the individual does not count at all. It is the people collectively. The Government does not consult the individual as to his desire or his opinion; it gets hold of him and says we need you in the service of the Nation. But if you are wounded, crippled, or disabled we will take care of you and your family. Very well. If you are incapacitated physically we will try to restore you to your former capacity. That is a national obligation. It is an extension of the pension system.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is it not also an extension of the principle of the Red Cross system?

Mr. LONDON. It is an extension of the principle of the pension system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. The war-risk insurance act is further extended in principle by providing compensation to the family. I contend that the very same principle should prevail here. Gentlemen forget that there is always plenty of room for the exercise of charity and kindness, and there will always be plenty of room for it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Would not there always be the same objection to it as contributing to this fund?

Mr. LONDON. Not at all; that kind of kindness which consists in warming one man's heart by another can not be adopted in or engrafted upon any resolution or a charter of a charity organization. There will always be room for genuine charity.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I wish to say that this act gives authority to the vocational education board to utilize the State organizations. No principle of the war insurance act or the pension laws is followed; it is entirely national in character. One feature of this act provides that all existing institutions that may be in a position to assist in the rehabilitation of the soldier must be taken into consideration, and if they are we do put into this measure an entirely different principle in which we reach out to get that assistance. Why is it not proper to take an educational institution and take gifts of all kinds?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. I am asking a question and perhaps arguing it at the same time. I want to differentiate between this act and the war insurance act and the pension laws.

Mr. LONDON. Those who drafted this bill evidently had in mind the fact that some institutions are in the process of construction and organization, some are now being formed, and they did not want to exclude them and did not want to prevent the board cooperating with them. But take this illustration: You have a man wounded, and instead of receiving the aid and compensation from the Government he will be placed in an institution maintained from the beginning to the end by the Rockefeller Foundation or the Carnegie Foundation. What will be the result? The result will be that the soldier will be maintained by a private institution and will feel that he is the beneficiary of that private institution, notwithstanding the fact that the Government is cooperating with the institution. It is this humiliating feature, this contaminating feature, that I desire to avoid. That is what is in my mind.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the proposed amendment. I do not agree at all with the gentleman from New York about section 7 of the bill. The whole bill is a temporary arrangement. We propose to take the soldiers when they come home from war; those that can be rehabilitated and those that wish to return to vocations they followed before they were wounded will be so returned to those employments, and if unable to do that kind of work like a man on the farm with the loss of both arms, they will put them into some other vocation by which they can make a living. Those that are so badly wounded that they can not be rehabilitated, those who are permanently incapacitated from self-support, must be maintained under the war-risk insurance bill.

Now, if you strike out section 7, which would prevent the contribution of any private fund or any public charitable fund, if you regard the Carnegie and Rockefeller Foundations as public charitable funds or the loaning of institutions—and in Pennsylvania we have 11 normal schools, and I imagine the State will be glad to voluntarily loan some of these to be used for this purpose. These buildings are equipped for this work to an admirable extent. In Pennsylvania we also have a lot of tuberculosis hospitals built on the mountains for the rehabilitation of those suffering from tuberculosis, and some of our soldiers will come home suffering from tuberculosis, and they can be put into these institutions at the expense of the State and rehabilitated in a manner that they could not be in any other place in the United States, or at least in any other place in our State.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It might be of interest to the gentleman to know that already representatives of various charitable and what we might call altruistic institutions have been to Washington and tendered their institutions to the Government.

Mr. ROBBINS. I so understand, and I was citing these instances because of such information, and if this motion prevails those offers could not be accepted, because there is now no authority of law for accepting them, and would be none under this act with paragraph 7 omitted.

Mr. POU. When the Government does what it deems to be just, as it is doing in this case, can the gentleman think of any reason why the private individual should not contribute and thereby enable the Government to be generous?

Mr. ROBBINS. None at all; and, moreover, there will be instances in this war where men of great wealth who have lost their lives will have willed their fortunes to the benefit of the soldiers who, while crippled, survive. I have heard of several such instances, and all such legacies would lapse with this provision stricken from the bill——

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. There are other propositions where wealthy men who have lost a son, say, are anxious to establish perpetual scholarships——

Mr. ROBBINS. I think that would hardly come under this provision. I think this means contributing to the work to be carried on by the Government under this act. Those outside charities, happily, will always exist. The great thing in this section is that the charitable uses or the charitable funds that are contributed—the charitable object to be obtained—are all "unconditional," as provided in line 12, page 6; yet these will always be under the control of the Government and not maintained as a separate charity. It will be a governmental matter all the time.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] seems to think it would be wiser to let people continue to suffer from the hookworm because Rockefeller has had something to do with the removal of it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it would be very wise to accept such charity. Furthermore, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted, because to my mind it would weaken this bill. Charity is the one thing that we all love and admire. St. Paul said it is the greatest of all virtues.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. The purpose of this bill, in addition to being a charitable measure, of course, is to carry out what we believe to be just in the rehabilitation of these veterans themselves. It is a new scheme, and while it is true that Canada has adopted it, we are going to adopt it on a grander and better scale; we are going to place it on a higher and nobler plane, where it will absolutely and completely care for our men during the period when they are helpless and while rehabilitation may be effected.

The bad effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to prevent the acceptance by the United States Government of any assistance from any gift of money or of any donation or of using any hospital or building of any kind for the rehabilitation of the wounded soldiers of this war, and the reason assigned for striking out the paragraph offered by the gentleman from New York is that any money that would be contributed by individuals would be regarded as "tainted money" and "that would taint the whole Government fund." He suggested that probably the Rockefeller Foundation or Carnegie Foundation would contribute money to this great beneficent purpose. I can see no reason why such gifts would not be in line with the great and good works these two splendid charities have carried on before and since war began. When this war is over, if conditions as it now appears prevail, charitable funds will not be as abundant as they have been in the past. We will have a great national debt and our taxes will be high. Our rich people will have already contributed largely of their funds to the Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. for charitable work, and there will be doubtless a large surplus in the hands of these two organizations that could be contributed to this purpose. Moreover, I believe that many wealthy individuals will be willing to contribute of their funds to assist our Government in this great work. It may be possible that some special lines of work could be carried on in different locations where suitable institutions could be secured by the expenditure of some additional money that would rehabilitate or relieve the suffering of many wounded soldiers who have ventured and given their all to the defense of our country. It would be a great misfortune for our Government's hands to be tied and these sources of additional revenue closed and this ability to serve these brave men taken away.

We are only appropriating by this bill about $4,000,000 to carry on this enormous work; at the same time we are sending millions of men to the trenches. This sum is totally inadequate, and if not increased by subsequent appropriations or by charitable gifts it will be grossly insufficient for the vast work that is to be performed.

No, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is wrong in theory, wrong of purpose, wrong in practice. It ought to be rejected.

This is the most beneficent bill that has been before Congress and is the one great piece of legislation that completes and rounds out our noble work for the soldier. We have drafted them into the service. We have doubled their pay while in active service, with 10 per cent additional when serving abroad.

We have provided in the war-risk insurance act for a liberal payment to their dependents, and in case of death for insurance covering a period of years, to be payable to their beneficiaries, and now, by this bill, we propose to aid those who return disabled from wounds or disease by the employment of skillful and careful doctors and teachers to rehabilitate them and make them self-supporting, so that life will hold for them something of interest and their suffering and deformity will, in a manner at least, be alleviated and removed. I support this bill most earnestly and enthusiastically, believing it to be right and just, and it can not be enacted too promptly, for the wounded are now coming back and demand our earnest and immediate attention.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that debate upon this amendment shall close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I was requested to speak on the bill now under consideration—say something in its favor. I most cheerfully agreed to do so, but I do not believe that a proposition so meritorious, so just, and so humane needs any speech in its favor. It speaks for itself. As far as argument in its behalf is concerned everything possible has been said by the acting chairman of the Committee on Education, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and he has been ably assisted by our colleague on this side, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. In this connection I desire to say that the gentleman from Ohio has rendered great service to the country since his advent into Congress, not only on this measure but in respect to other measures reported by the Committee on Education. He has been a very valuable asset not only to the Republican side of the House, but to the Democratic side as well, in the consideration of legislation from this and the other committees of the House.

A word now as to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], the sole and only representative of the great Socialist Party—so tender-hearted, so alarmed, so fearful that he may be contaminated and that something will be done here which will be discreditable to the American Congress! Mr. Chairman, I remember very well the speeches made by the gentleman from New York when there was a great revolution in Russia, when his friends assumed charge there, and I remember how he stood as a sponsor for that "great government," which was to enlighten the world and set a great example by following which we might remove the imperfections of this glorious Republic of ours. Week in and week out since that time we have witnessed the miserable failure they have made—how they have butchered justice, how they have destroyed liberty, how they alone have given encouragement to the Kaiser and autocracy. We have witnessed the cowardice and the absolute surrender and the apparent corruption—the receipt of money from the Kaiser by those men who were glorified here in our presence.

This miserable crew of socialists, posing as patriots, cruelly, cowardly, and corruptly betrayed their country, Russia, and her allies, prolonged this bloody war, and added untold miseries, billions to its cost, and countless precious lives. It almost made possible the triumph of the autocratic world-conquest plans of the Kaiser. This great tragedy in Russia should and will destroy socialism in America and, let us hope, throughout the world.

I remember quite well being present when this entire membership, with one dissenting voice, the voice of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], either not voting or sitting silently, refusing to vote for the first financial bill, the first war bill to underwrite the expenses of this great struggle for world-wide liberty and to destroy autocracy and the attempted conquest of the world by the Emperor of Germany and his military machine. When that measure, carrying countless millions to be handed over to the people of Russia and our other allies in Europe, was passed, this man who now attempts to criticize this bill and to point out to us what legislation we should pass, I remember was the only slacker out of 435 Members of the American Congress. He now decries what Andy Carnegie has done in the world—the man who has furnished free libraries throughout the length and breadth of America. What Socialist has done so much for the people? When the cruel tyrant, the Emperor of Germany, with his army was going over Belgium, destroying its cities and murdering its innocent people, what was the Rockefeller Institute doing? Loading ship after ship, spending millions in sending and providing relief to the suffering thousands and saving them from absolute want and starvation, and while it is fresh in our memory we are warned here against the Rockefeller endowment or institute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Just two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. This great legislative body, the greatest in the world, is supposed to be made up of men, broad men, liberal men, just men, who can look above the hour and the pleadings of those who seek to array class against class. In this great world war America is in line, and we have passed legislation which not only provides for the son of the lowly and the poor to fight in defense of the Republic, but that same legislation has also called to the colors the sons of the rich, the millionaires. Let us forget during this period of war these demagogical appeals to prejudice, passion, and class. They are unworthy of any man in this House [applause], and I resent its constant flaunting here in our faces. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to do something to attest his loyalty to America. He has been voting against what the Commander in Chief recommended, and I suggest, even at this late hour, that he mend his ways, correct his mistakes, and cease his foolishness in the presence of the enlightened Representatives of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I have not enough respect for the opinion or the judgment of the gentleman who immediately preceded me to reply to him. I prefer not to pay any attention to anything he has said or anything he is going to say.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $2,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used by the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the purposes of this act, to wit, for renting and remodeling buildings and quarters, repairing, maintaining, and equipping same, and for equipment and other facilities necessary for proper instruction of disabled persons, $250,000; for the preparation of instructors and salaries of instructors, supervisors, and other experts, including necessary traveling expenses, $545,000; for traveling expenses of disabled persons in connection with training and for lodging, subsistence, and other necessary expenses in special cases of persons following prescribed courses, $250,000; for tuition for disabled persons pursuing courses in existing institutions, public or private, $545,000; for the placement and supervision after placement of vocationally rehabilitated persons, $45,000; for studies, investigations, reports, and preparation of special courses of instruction, $55,000; for miscellaneous contingencies, including special mechanical appliances necessary in special cases for disabled men, $110,000; and for the administrative expenses of said board incident to performing the duties imposed by this act, including salaries of such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as the board may deem necessary, actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by the members of the board and by its employees under its orders, including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, rent and equipment of offices in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals, stationery, typewriters and exchange thereof, miscellaneous supplies, postage on foreign mail, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and all other necessary expenses, $200,000.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This legislation which will soon have been completed practically completes the cycle of work of this Government from the selecting of men for service to putting them back again into industrial and social life after they shall have made their sacrifice. This war has been peculiar in that it has produced a great many infirmities which were unknown in past wars. After I looked the other night on that wonderful display sent down here from Canada, where we saw the condition in which those men were when they returned, I thought upon the work of the enemy of human liberty. I could find nothing in all the literature of the world which seemed in a measure to describe the activity of our enemy except hell and its master in Milton's Paradise Lost and in Dante's Inferno. If ever hell itself with all of its diabolical ingenuity was turned loose on earth it has been done by the Imperial German Government. It has resulted in the terrible condition, nervous and physical wrecks which are to come back to our shores, not having been given a chance to fight the fight of men against men, but to fight a fight of men against demons and demonical methods. This work of rehabilitation will bespeak as far as possible the heart of America in its effort to restore these men again to life and usefulness. I am glad to say the city of St. Louis, as it has done in a number of instances since war was declared, was the first place in America where there was an organized effort made by private subscription and by private citizens to establish an institution for the rehabilitation of these soldiers. About a year ago there was organized what was called the White Cross. The work there started was mentioned by me in the Congress. Only a few weeks ago those citizens, having become impatient with the delay of the Government in getting to its work, sent a request here to know whether the Government was going to do something and do it at once. If not, they were starting for a single-day campaign of $50,000 as a beginning of this rehabilitation work. I am sure this legislation when it shall have become law will have much to do, if not in convincing the enemy, obtuse as he is and incapable of admitting or understanding anything of humanitarian methods, in at least impressing upon the people of his nation, when they at last find it out, that the heart of America even during war is as tender as it has ever been. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That section 304 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, is hereby repealed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Commissioner from Porto Rico be allowed to have the floor for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Commissioner from Porto Rico be allowed to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer this amendment to the present bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Porto Rico.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, line 2, after the word "repealed," add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 11. That the provisions of the act of February 23, 1917 (Public Law, No. 347, 64th Cong.), an act entitled 'An act to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure,' be, and is hereby, amended to extend to Porto Rico."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves a point of order. The gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman, while the bill under consideration provides for the vocational rehabilitation of the Porto Rican soldiers who will return home maimed and permanently disabled from the field of battle, yet the fact remains that under existing law the children and dependents of those same soldiers are excluded from the benefits of the vocational educational system which this Congress has extended to all the States of the Union. It is to correct this injustice that the amendment is offered.

I can say with perfect frankness that not only has the justness of this amendment been admitted by members of both committees of the House and Senate having jurisdiction of the matter, but they have likewise said there was no chance for the successful consideration of the matter at this session of Congress unless it is provided for in the bill now under consideration.

The people of Porto Rico believe that the situation under which they suffer has only to be made known to the American Congress in order to be corrected, and no greater incentive could be extended to the Porto Rican soldier provided for in this bill than the knowledge that the privileges of vocational education which are now accorded by the Federal Government to the children of all the States will in the future be accorded to the children of Porto Rico, upon like terms and conditions.

Mr. Chairman, the present crisis has amply demonstrated that no more patriotic nor devoted people exist beneath the flag than the citizens of Porto Rico. [Applause.] That was eloquently stated in a recent article by Mr. Henry A. Wise, in the following language:

On March 2, 1917, American citizenship was conferred upon the Porto Rican. For nearly two decades he had had a land but no country. For 19 years he had been knocking at our door, unable to enter or to go elsewhere. The flag over his head was not his flag, nor could he raise one of his own. So only two months before our declaration of war the Porto Rican was not an American citizen. Would he, therefore, be willing to fight for our cause?

It was this query, possibly, that caused the War Department to hesitate when announcing the draft to apply it to Porto Rico. But this hesitation, whatever its cause, had a galvanic effect upon the people of the island. Instantly there arose an indignant protest and a demand that Porto Rico be permitted to supply its full quota to the Army, whose flag was its flag.

[Applause.]

Not only would it fight, but the opportunity to do so it demanded as its right. The children of Columbus's conquistadores were willing and ready to support the liberties of the New World, the world that he and his ancestors had carved out with their swords.

So a resolution was passed by the Porto Rican Legislature and hurried to Washington, whereupon compulsory military service—that "act of conscription" so abhorrent to some who are unworthy of our blood—was granted to the island, and by it welcomed in its true form, as the obligation and privilege of a free people. It is probable that no document of similar purport can be found in history; certainly it can not be found in our history.

As a concrete illustration of the military service of Porto Rico during the present crisis, I may cite the guard duty that is now being performed in the Canal Zone by the Porto Rican Regiment of Infantry. The great canal that joins the two oceans, the greatest engineering triumph of all time, America's contribution to the twentieth century, and the especial pride of all the American people has been committed to the care of Porto Rican troops.

When the people of that island requested that they be allowed to participate with their brother Americans in the horrors and hardships of the war she furnished to the colors more than 12,000 of her sons under the first call—a number that was larger than 25 of the sovereign States were called upon to furnish under the adjustment determined upon by the War Department. [Applause.]

That same proud showing has been preserved in the subsequent calls, and nowhere beneath the folds of the flag has there been a more ready response for service than on the island of Porto Rico.

I have had the pleasure of hearing the Secretary of War say that this response of Porto Rico to the call of the Nation has been one of the most pleasing incidents connected with the war that has come within his notice.

A great training camp has been established at San Juan. It has been estimated that some thirty thousand troops will soon be under arms there, and they are shortly to take their places side by side with their brothers from the States on the far-flung battle line in France. [Applause.]

We of Porto Rico look forward with confidence to the record our brothers and sons will make in the great epic struggle for liberty now being fought in France, and we likewise believe that we can appeal with confidence to the generosity of the American people when we ask them to extend to us the simple justice provided for in the amendment I have just offered.

We have already provided that if the benefits of the Smith-Hughes law are made applicable to Porto Rico, the sums of money granted will be more than matched by the amounts already being spent in vocational work. The Legislature of Porto Rico has already gone on record as desiring to receive the benefits of the law, and, should it be necessary, that body will make such additional appropriations as may be needed in order to secure to Porto Rico the benefits of the act.

I will not further detain the House now, but at some future time, Mr. Chairman, I hope, if accorded unanimous consent, to address the House upon the participation of Porto Rico in the war and the political aspirations of her people. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I simply rise to state to the House that the Smith-Hughes bill, which this amendment proposes to make applicable to Porto Rico, omitted Porto Rico in the legislation of 1917. It omitted it on the basis that that bill was a contract between two sovereignties, the sovereignty of the Nation and the sovereignty of the State, and all the way through the words are—

The board shall have the power to cooperate with State boards in carrying out the provisions of the act.

Porto Rico not occupying the status of a sovereign State, it could not be dealt with as Ohio or other States. And that is the reason the Smith-Hughes bill does not comprehend Porto Rico; so the benefits of vocational education under that law do not extend to Porto Rico. Secondly, the organic law for Porto Rico which was passed not long ago is the proper channel for such training for the Porto Ricans.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Do the provisions of that bill apply to Hawaii and Alaska?

Mr. FESS. I think not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Or the Philippines?

Mr. FESS. No. One reason why it was omitted, aside from what I have said, is that under the relationship between the Federal Government and these possessions it was thought that the proper legislation on vocational education would come directly from Congress rather than from this bill.

I understand that there is not anything in our organic act that authorizes Porto Rico to proceed to vocational education through any Federal help, and I told the commissioner when he spoke to me that this amendment would be out of order on this bill, and I was sure would not be allowed to stand. I do not think it ought to. But I do think that, either under the organic act under which Porto Rico is now governed, this authority must be provided or else this Federal act of the Smith-Hughes bill should be amended so that the benefits should extend to Porto Rico. In other words, I think Porto Rico has shown that she deserves the benefits of vocational education through Federal help. And while I am sorry it can not come on this bill, I hope Congress will in no time open the way so that this commissioner may see that the work will be applied to his island.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether he thought that the fact that the Smith-Hughes bill does not apply to Porto Rico would deprive the Porto Rican soldier from the benefit of the rehabilitation?

Mr. FESS. No. The Porto Ricans under this bill have vocational training of their disabled soldiers, but not under the Smith-Hughes Act. The commissioner wants everybody in Porto Rico that desires vocational training—soldier or not—to get the benefits of the law the same as the States which cooperate.

Mr. PLATT. If this bill extends to Porto Rico a certain amount of authority on the part of the Vocational Educational Board, is it not in order on this bill to give it full authority there?

Mr. FESS. You can not put the Smith-Hughes bill on this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to make the point of order against the amendment of the gentleman from Porto Rico for the reasons explained and which I think he understands.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIEGEL: Page 8, line 21, insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 11. No person of draft age, physically fit for military service, shall be exempted from such service on account of being employed under the terms of this act."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask the gentleman to state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is germane. That same amendment has gone on every other bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether this particular question has been passed on or not, Mr. Chairman. My attention has been called to the fact that a similar amendment to this was offered on the other bill. I therefore do not care to insist on the point of order, because I would not care to do it unless I was sure of the soundness of my position. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, this is the usual amendment that has been offered to all the bills and adopted. It would simply prevent this commission from being filled up with a lot of young men of draft age, and who would then be exempted.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think if we are to go into the business of rehabilitating these men that come back wounded and maimed, they ought to have the benefit of the best learning and the best training that can be had, whether those possessing that training are within the draft or not within the draft age?

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman, I will say that my amendment does not apply to the men who are to be rehabilitated. It simply applies to those men who will be obtained from the civil-service lists, or rather exempted employees who will be obtained and who will flock into this department, just as they have flocked into other departments, and then have the heads of departments claim their exemption. It is to prevent that condition of affairs that I have offered it. The amendment does not prevent any single man coming back from abroad rendering any service to this commission. This amendment applies to those who go into this department solely to escape military service and who are of draft age. It is aimed directly and solely and exclusively against those gentlemen. I think the amendment should be adopted in order to prevent those gentlemen from getting into this service and sheltering themselves here in the city of Washington or some other center.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it reaches those who come under the act and not those who administer the act. I think the wording of the gentleman's amendment is not going to carry out the idea that he has in mind.

Mr. SIEGEL. The wording of that amendment, as I have offered it, will carry out that idea, for the reason that it provides that no person fit for military service shall be exempted, and certainly these men who come back from abroad disabled will not be fit for military service.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request—that I may extend my remarks on this bill.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?
There was no objection.
Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. FARR. And I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?
There was no objection.
Mr. LONDON. And, Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?
There was no objection.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HELM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.
The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.
The amendments were agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.
The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.
The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?
The question was taken, and the bill was passed.
The SPEAKER. The bill is passed unanimously.
On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.
Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House bill (H. R. 12212) of similar tenor be laid on the table.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill of similar tenor will be laid on the table.
There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DENISON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of important business.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 11, 1918.

(Legislative day of Monday, June 10, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY) assumed the chair.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 235, proposing to amend the rules of the Senate by providing for the limitation of debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Nugent	Sutherland
Culberson	Kendrick	Overman	Thompson
Cummins	Kenyon	Page	Tillman
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Robinson	Underwood
Fall	Knox	Saulsbury	Vardaman
France	Lenroot	Shafroth	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Gallinger	McCumber	Sherman	Willey
Gronna	McKellar	Shields
Guion	McLean	Simmons
Hale	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY). My colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. My colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], is absent on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS obtained the floor.

PRINTING OF PETITIONS, ETC., IN THE RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make an explanation to the Senate for two or three minutes?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. By being chairman of the Committee on Printing and the joint committee of the two Houses, I find that a very unpleasant duty has been thrown upon me and that I have been subjected at times in my absence to infantile criticism and puerile gibes, with the suggestion that I should be always in this Chamber in order to protect the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from imposition and against the rules of this body.

I therefore want to call the attention of those Senators to the fact that the rule is that—

> Every petition and memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents and shall be presented and referred without debate.

This is paragraph 5 of Rule VII.

Paragraph 1 of Rule XXIX reads:

> Every motion to print * * * memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except * * * communications from legislatures or conventions lawfully called of the respective States * * * shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Last October the Committee on Printing ordered me to report and I did report a resolution (S. Res. 77), and on October 5, 1917, it passed this body. That resolution says:

> Resolved, That only a brief statement of the contents as provided for in Rule VII, paragraph 5—

The rule that I have already quoted—> of such communications as are presented under the order of business "Presentation of petitions and memorials" shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that no other portion of such communication shall be inserted in the RECORD unless specifically so ordered by vote of the Senate, as provided for in Rule XXIX, paragraph 1.

Then the resolution says:

> Except that communications from the legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, Territories, and insular possessions shall be printed in full in the RECORD whenever presented.

Now, if the Chair will execute the rule of the Senate, there is no necessity for me or my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] being placed in the position of being a watchdog of the Treasury, as my neighbor [Mr. TILLMAN] charged me with being, as though I was officiously intruding myself for the purpose of cheap notoriety in an effort to save the Treasury of the United States from the assault of Members having less regard for their duty than I have.

Mr. President, I have called this matter to the attention of the Senate in my own protection, and I want every Member of the Senate to know when they ask unanimous consent to print all the stuff that they have been printing in the RECORD it is in violation of the rules of the Senate and not in contravention of any desire of mine in the premises.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the congregation of the Methodist Church of Grandview, Wash., and a telegram in the nature of a petition from Wilbur F. Crafts, of Columbus, Ohio, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 237).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit the conference report on House bill 11185, the Military Academy appropriation bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table for the present. I wish to give notice that I shall take occasion at the first opportunity to call up the report for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 6, 94, 98, 99, 100, 101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 121, 123, and 124.

Amendment numbered 111: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 111, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 16, line 10, in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,198,237.95"; and the Senate agree to the same.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 235, proposing to amend the rules of the Senate by providing for the limitation of debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the pending amendment, if agreed to, will change the rules of the Senate so that treaties will be considered in open session and not in secret or executive session. If anyone either in the Senate or out of it should propose that the legislation of the Senate and of the House should all be behind closed doors his proposition would receive universal condemnation all over the country. All legislation considered in Congress is considered in the open. Provision is made to give ample opportunity to representatives of newspapers to publish to the world the transactions both of the House and the Senate. A gallery is provided for those who desire to listen to the deliberations and the official action of both the House and the Senate. All of this has for its one and sole object publicity.

The same could be said of every legislature of every State in the Union. No one anywhere in the civilized world, so far as I know, advocates that laws should be made in secret or considered in secret.

It is unnecessary, Mr. President, to go into an argument to demonstrate the wisdom of this course. I think it will be conceded by everybody that no government could or would long remain free if its legislature, its law-making body, transacted its business behind closed doors in secret. Publicity of their official action is regarded and recognized as one of the necessities in every progressive free government.

The Constitution of the United States provides that all treaties shall be the supreme law of the land. When a treaty is once ratified and promulgated it becomes a law the same as any act passed by the Senate and the House and signed by the President. It is a rule of action that controls every citizen of the Republic, yea, more, Mr. President, it goes further than most of the laws; it is not only binding upon all the citizens of the country, but it has a direct relation as a rule with the conduct of citizens and of the Government itself with other nations of the world.

It seems to me, therefore, that the same reasons which provide for publicity in the consideration of all acts of all legislatures that become laws and govern the people of the country and of the States would apply with double force to every treaty that becomes a law and controls in the same way the rights and the privileges and the destinies not only of the people but of the Nation itself.

More than that, Mr. President, a Federal law is considered in the open not only in the Senate but in the House of Representatives. A treaty never reaches the House of Representatives. The only place where it is considered by any legislative body of the country is in the Senate; and if it is considered there in secret, then it never receives at the hands of any lawmaking body any public consideration as far as this country is concerned, at least.

It seems, therefore, that there is more reason why an act which we denominate a treaty, which shall by our action become a law, should be considered in the public and in the open than though the Senate considered all legislative matters behind closed doors, when we consider that no one either here or elsewhere would for a moment claim that we ought to consider legislative matters behind closed doors, even though if we did so consider them they would be considered again in the House of Representatives in the open, and when we take into consideration the fact that we are the only legislative body that considers a treaty and gives it its only legislative consideration, and if we deny publicity to its consideration here it never receives any public consideration and becomes binding upon all the people and upon the Nation itself without ever having been considered in the light of publicity.

It is unnecessary to consider the objects of this publicity in our official action. It is well known that it is one of the prerogatives of a democratic form of government, it is one of the absolute necessities of a free people, and when we take into consideration the fact that a treaty extends even further in most instances than any ordinary act we consider and pass, if there is any virtue in the consideration and in the performance of our official duties in public it applies with double force to a treaty.

So much, Mr. President, for the consideration of a treaty as far as it applies and has relation to our own people and our own country, but in recent years, more properly speaking in recent months, in recent days, the condemnation of secret diplomacy has been almost universal.

I do not believe it is necessary to make an argument in order to show the evils that will follow and which have followed secret diplomacy. It is one of the issues of the war in which we are engaged to get rid of secret diplomacy. That is not only considered desirable by all, but it is almost universally conceded that it is one of the things for which we are fighting in the present war, and which we are going to demand as one of the things to be brought about in the treaty of peace. So far as I know, that statement is uncontradicted from any source or by any person. Secret diplomacy is recognized as a breeder of strife, and often brings about war in its wake.

I am not going to review the ground that has been so well gone over by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in pointing out the evils that have come in recent years merely because of secret diplomacy. The excuse for it, which I have heard, has been that in Europe the negotiations are not only secret, but the treaty remains a secret after it is negotiated, while here, as a rule, we remove the ban of secrecy from the diplomacy as soon as we have acted upon it. I think the method which we have pursued in the past is far better than that which has been pursued by most, if not all, of the European Governments, but it is only so in degree.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Why does the Senator from Nebraska use the expression "that, as a general rule, we remove the seal of secrecy from treaties"? Are there any treaties which are kept secret?

Mr. NORRIS. There are none of which I know. I made that statement because, as I understand, there is nothing compulsory about removing the seal of secrecy from a treaty.

Mr. POMERENE. We even remove the seal of secrecy so far as the vote upon the treaty is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; so far as I know, we have, which is entirely proper, but it is not obligatory that we should do that; we have no rule with which I am familiar that requires that that must be done.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's statement led me to believe that possibly he had in mind some treaty from which the seal of secrecy had not been removed.

Mr. NORRIS. If I conveyed that impression, I did not intend to do so; but the reason I put it in that language was because, as I understand, there is no law or rule which requires the removal of the ban of secrecy from a treaty. As a rule, it is always done by unanimous consent, but it could be done by a motion.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to say that, if we have any secret treaty, I have never heard of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any such treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know any particular treaty from which the seal of secrecy has not been removed, but I know of some treaties from which it was not removed until after public opinion ceased to be interested. However, it takes a vote of the Senate to remove it. It does not by reason of any provision either of our rules or of the Constitution or anything else, of itself, ipso facto, become a public instrument. It takes the action of the Senate to remove the seal of secrecy.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to my mind, the very fact that, as a rule—and I again use that word in the same sense that I previously used it; I do not want to give an erroneous impression—the very fact that we do, as a general proposition, so far as I know, since I have been here without exception, remove the seal of secrecy after a treaty has been agreed to, it seems to me is a strong argument why treaties should be considered in the open. I can not myself see why we should consider a treaty in secret and then afterwards remove the seal of secrecy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska what really is the virtue or the advantage of making a treaty public after it has been concluded and is binding? What is the great advantage to be derived from that about which those in opposition to this proposed rule speak so earnestly?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, I myself do not know of any reason. I have never yet since I have been here seen the Senate consider a treaty where I could perceive any reason whatever for considering it in secret.

Mr. BORAH. No; but what is the benefit or virtue or advantage to be derived from making a treaty public after it has been concluded?

Mr. NORRIS. The only benefit that I can see that would come from that would be to give the people notice of the passage of a law which has been enacted in secret which is going to govern them, so that they may act accordingly and not violate it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but certainly it is not made public with a view of having another body, to wit, the public, review it and abrogate it?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; there could not be such an object, because it would be too late to accomplish that result.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Then, the object of making the treaty public is not to give the people any advantage whatever or public opinion any effect whatever, with reference to the shaping or the formation of the treaty, but simply to advise them how to control and guide themselves with reference to a law, if we may call a treaty a law, which has already been put into effect.

It is not to be presumed that we are going to abrogate a treaty; it is not to be presumed that, as a Government, we are going to make a treaty and then make it public for the purpose of giving the public an opportunity of abrogating it or forcing its annulment. If that should be so, then we should have practically two treaty-making powers.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, as a matter of law, of course, the people have no power to abrogate a treaty afterwards except by the creation of a public sentiment so as to change the Senate or to bring about a sentiment favoring its abrogation.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; which renders it practically impossible for them to accomplish anything.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. And the only object and purpose of making a treaty public, therefore, must be to advise the people of the obligation which may rest upon them under it by virtue of the treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any other object.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, then, the mere fact of making the treaty public afterwards does not give the public any chance whatever to pass upon the matter during its formation and give to them any say as to what its terms shall be.

Mr. NORRIS. None whatever.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am, of course, in favor of the open consideration of treaties and of nominations as well, conceding that there may be a case—although I have never seen one—in which there ought to be a secret session for the consideration of treaties or nominations; but there is another aspect of it which I want to call to the Senate's attention, which has not been mentioned at all, and which appeals pretty strongly to me.

We pretend to hold secret sessions in considering treaties, but if the subject is of any importance and excites any interest anywhere, is it not true that what purports to be a report of the proceedings of the Senate in secret session is always published—generally incomplete, generally perverted, ordinarily distorted—but an account of that kind nearly always reaches the public, and reaches it simply because the American mind is so instinctively against secrecy that what occurs here leaks out in some way or other? I think that infinitely more harm, even from the standpoint of those who are in favor of secret sessions, is done through incorrect or partially incorrect reports of secret sessions than could possibly be done by a fair and truthful report of what occurred.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has mentioned a point to which I intended to advert, and he has covered it so well that it will be unnecessary for me to go over it again. I think every Senator here recognizes the fact that when mystery surrounds any given subject, and when unauthenticated reports unknown to be either reliable or unreliable are put in circulation, a vast amount of harm is likely to be done. I can see how reports purporting to be accounts of what took place in the Senate in a secret session may bring about a great deal of harm and do a great deal of damage to the country. With the mystery that would naturally arise in such a case, and the reports being carried from mouth to mouth and from one newspaper to another and altered and explained, with perhaps only a portion of the truth being really known, even the position of our country is likely to be misapprehended and misunderstood by other nations, and, as well, our citizens are apt to be given a wrong idea and wrong conception of what took place in the secret session.

The very fact that a secret session is held is of itself alone an indication to the ordinary mind that something is going on behind closed doors that might be injurious if it were known, and that is the idea people conceive when, so far as I have ever known in connection with any treaty that I have ever heard considered here in secret session, there could have been no harm, but good would have resulted, if every argument made behind closed doors had been made in the open so that everybody might hear and all might read accurate accounts of what took place.

Assuming that we are only going to agree to negotiations and ratify treaties that are honorable, honest, and fair not only to ourselves but to the other nations of the world—and that is a fair assumption, for no one would claim for a moment that we want to or that we will do anything different from that—assuming that to be true, then why not let the correct report go out, not only to our people, but to the world, and thus have no misunderstanding and no possibility of a wrong conception being placed upon our action? To my mind it is a vital proposition, and although I am willing to concede that there are other causes for misunderstanding between our Government and other Governments, and there are other causes of war and disagreement—and I would not offer this as a panacea for all the evils of international complications—yet it will go a great way toward ridding the world of the misunderstandings and of the secret agreements that are brought about between other Governments with which we have nothing in common.

If we shall say to the world that hereafter all treaties that we negotiate are going to be considered in the light of publicity before the world, no man can tell the good such a precedent will have upon other countries. That is particularly true now, Senators, when we know that at the close of this war great questions must be determined and settled by treaty, and one of the points upon which we are insisting is that secret diplomacy shall cease. We ought, therefore, to get rid of the last vestige of it ourselves, and thus be in condition to ask that the other nations of the world should rid themselves of secret diplomacy, which is, in my judgment, a relic of the days of barbarism.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, unfortunately I was not present yesterday to hear the entire statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], former Secretary of State, with reference to the ordinary and legal course of procedure in connection with negotiations with foreign nations. I have, however, read in the RECORD with great interest what that Senator had to say, realizing, of course, that it comes with more force, being from an authoritative source—that is, a source which at least was authoritative to within a short period of time in the history of this country. We have a State Department organized under the laws and the Constitution of the United States. The Senator from Pennsylvania very interestingly told us what the course of that department, organized for the purpose, was with reference to negotiations with foreign countries.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say that the Senator, in speaking as he did, of course, spoke with reference to the history of the country for one hundred and forty-odd years, and did not bring his argument or his statement as to diplomatic procedure down to date. On yesterday morning we received new light upon the subject through the source from which we here in the Senate are compelled to accept authoritative information with reference not only to domestic affairs but particularly to the foreign relations of this country, and that is the public press.

In the Post of yesterday morning there appeared an article which, to my mind, was and is in many respects the most remarkable statement which I have ever heard of or have ever read in any paper, but apparently it is authoritative. At any rate, it pretends to speak for the Government of the United States. Although the article is written by Ryley Grannon, it assumes to speak for the Government of the United States. A day has passed, and very much to my surprise there has been no comment, so far as I have seen, in the public press and no repudiation from any source whatsoever either of the facts apparently set forth by Mr. Grannon or of his authority for the statement of those facts. Therefore, as we have a publicity bureau whose work is fairly well understood—in fact, some 47 publicity bureaus—and as I have evidence in my possession that the State Department has a very effective method of suppressing any news which it desires to suppress, in view of the fact that there has been no repudiation and no comment, I must assume, as I have said, that the statement of facts contained in this article is authoritative.

Mr. Grannon says:

The United States Government is weakening in its position toward Bulgaria and Turkey. It has steadfastly refused thus far to declare war, although dozens of acts of war have been committed by both Governments against the United States.

But now, under pressure from the allies, backed by evidence of Bulgaro-Turkish participation in the German offensives in France, Col. House and Justice Brandeis are said to be inclined to think that a change of policy is unavoidable.

STUDIED BY JUSTICE BRANDEIS.

The subject of America's relationship with Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey has been under special study by Justice Brandeis, who is becoming more and more potent in the Government's councils.

Before he became interested in the internal situation in Austria-Hungary it was the President's idea that the United States should deal gingerly with Austria, as there appeared to him some chance that Austria might break with Germany.

Accordingly he intimated in one of his addresses to Congress that the United States was not seeking the disruption of the Hapsburg Empire. On another occasion he said that while Bulgaria and Turkey were equally guilty with Austria of acts of war they were not directly in America's path and could be dealt with later.

GETTING AT THE FACTS.

Justice Brandeis has gone into these matters with characteristic thoroughness. He has established what amounts to a war office of his own, and he has called into conference the authoritative intelligence of this and foreign countries.

Among his recent visitors was Thomas G. Masaryk, head of the Bohemian Provisional Government, who gave the President's representative a wealth of material concerning the interior problems of Austria-Hungary and outlined a method whereby the United States may be of material service to the oppressed races now trying to break Austria's hold upon them.

SERBIAN MINISTER HELPS.

It was following these conferences, and because of them and equally important information from the Serbian minister, that Justice Brandeis caused the State Department to issue a statement expressing sympathy for the oppressed races of Austria in their struggle for freedom.

The statement is the only outward evidence of American assistance. It should not be forgotten, however, that Secretary Baker recently indicated that American troops would soon be fighting Austria.

Secretary Baker and Justice Brandeis are in close touch. It is sufficient at this point to say that the United States Government meant much more than appears on the surface of the brief statement which Justice Brandeis caused to appear for the information of the oppressed races in Austria.

ADVICE AS TO TURKEY.

Regarding Turkey, the advice heretofore given to the administration by Cleveland H. Dodge and other trusted and well-informed friends has caused the Government to hesitate before declaring war. There is valuable American property in Turkey, especially Roberts College, which would be put in jeopardy if war should be declared.

Mr. Dodge, as a trustee of Roberts College, is anxious to prevent the useless destruction of the property and the wiping away of all American influence so laboriously built up over many decades. He shares the opinion of the American missionary board that Turkish atrocities would increase rather than diminish if the United States should incite the Turks to anger by declaring war on them.

PALESTINE QUESTION INVOLVED.

The Turkish question has also been affected by the movement to create a Jewish State in Palestine. Some of the leading Jews of England and America insist that the best method of achieving an independent Jewish State is through negotiation, and not by wresting Palestine from Germany and Turkey by force.

They believe that conquest by force would be followed for years by disorders and feuds. The attitude of Justice Brandeis, who is deeply interested in the Zionist movement, has not been made known.

The allied Governments have taken occasion to advise the United States of indisputable evidence that Bulgar and Turkish troops are employed by Germany in support of the offensive in France.

These troops are not known to be at the front, but thousands of them are in the transport and railroad service throughout Germany and Austria. An entire division of Bulgarians is on the Italian front, where Secretary Baker says Americans will soon be fighting.

One of the significant straws in the wind is the fact that the Bulgarian minister in Washington, M. Stephen Panaretoff, while formally remaining persona grata, has had his telegraph, mail, and cable facilities curtailed and placed under the supervision of the Government.

HIS DISPATCHES CENSORED.

He could not send messages to Sofia for the information of Berlin, if he should be disposed to do so. The Government has found it advisable to cut off direct and uncensored communication, although no allegation is made that the Bulgarian minister has sought to use his diplomatic privileges to send intelligence to Germany.

M. Panaretoff has not entered any objection to this interference with his means of communication, although ordinarily a diplomatic representative would not lose any time in making a pointed protest.

The policy of the German Government, however, is to maintain Bulgarian and Turkish representation in Washington as long as possible, and it is not for the minister to complain of inconvenience.

CLASH MAY END RELATIONS.

Needless to say, the voluntary withdrawal of Bulgaria's diplomatic representative from Washington would be a relief to the United States Government.

Further pressure from the allied Governments, and the probable clash of Americans and Bulgarians in battle, are expected to put an end to the equivocal relations of the two countries.

In the meantime Col. House is making a thorough survey of the Turkish situation, and his views, together with those of Justice Brandeis, will no doubt prevail with the President in making his decision.

Mr. President, I have occupied some portion of the time of the Senate in discussing the proposed amendment to the rules now under consideration, and I have simply read this article into the RECORD that it might appear, as it were, in parallel columns with the statement of the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] as to the due and orderly and logical and constitutional course pursued by this Government in the matter of managing its diplomatic relations. I say, forsooth, by this Government. Of course, I refer to the period prior to the retirement of the eminent Senator from the office of Secretary of State.

Mr. President, there are a few thoughts necessarily entertained by those of us who have an interest in foreign relations, as Members of this body, in considering this article. One, I might say, as a matter of first impression would be this: The matter of the declaration of war against Turkey or Bulgaria, or both, is peculiarly and solely a matter for the consideration of the Congress of the United States and not for the consideration of the President of the United States, nor of Justice Brandeis, nor of Col. House, except that, of course, the Congress of the United States would be glad to have advice and information from the President of the United States, from whatever source he might obtain his information. The decision of the Government, arrived at and referred here upon the conclusions of Justice Brandeis and Col. House, might be binding, of course, upon the Congress of the United States, and very likely, I may say, would be, when their conclusions were intimated to Congress by the President of the United States. But in view of the fact that a resolution for a declaration of war against these two countries is pending at this time before the Foreign Relations Committee, the committee of this body charged peculiarly with investigations of this character under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, it must become apparent, granting that the statements contained herein are authoritative, that the constitution of the present Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate of the United States is not persona grata to the President of the United States. This is the only conclusion I can draw.

This matter is one peculiarly within the province of the Senate itself to rectify. I recommend to the earnest consideration of my colleagues in this body this thought, and that as it is necessary in this time of war that the Congress of the United States and the administrative department of the Nation should act in the closest accord and sympathy, the leaders in this body should immediately proceed to reorganize the Foreign Relations Committee of this body, so that the chairman and the members may have the confidence of the President of the United States, and it may not be necessary for him to delegate to Justice Brandeis or to Col. House the consideration of the matter of a declaration of war, with which the President has absolutely nothing to do.

I might say, of course, that it is evident that the State Department, through which great department of this Government it is customary to carry on and conduct diplomatic negotiations, is not in the good graces of the White House for some reason. This is my personal opinion, of course, but it is formed from a rather serious consideration of the facts stated authoritatively in this article. It must be apparent that unless the President had more confidence in Justice Brandeis or in Col. House than in the Secretary of State, he would have left to the legal and constitutional and lawful department of this Government the consideration of these matters, as they have heretofore been considered in an unbroken line of diplomatic history of this country.

These few thoughts, Mr. President, have occurred to me, and I have dared to express them, merely as opportune at this time. It is absolutely necessary, Senators, of course, that the Congress and the Executive should act together in this great crisis. It must be evident, from the fact that this statement is not denied or questioned, that neither the Congress nor the State Department has the confidence of the administration, or is deemed capable by it of conducting the affairs which pertain particularly to the department on the one hand and to the Congress upon the other.

Mr. President, another thought, and one that I may recommend to my colleagues in the Senate: The time will come, Senators, sooner or later, when the people of the United States, whose representatives we are, will rise in their might and demand that the Constitution and the laws of the United States be restored and be observed. You gentlemen will see, and in my judgment as an outgrowth of this very debate now, that the people will demand, not that the ratification of treaties be referred to them, to be acted upon through their individual votes, but that those matters be thoroughly discussed and understood by their representatives whom they have commissioned to deal with affairs of this character, and that they shall be so discussed openly, prior to final action binding their hands, so that the people themselves, through the great force of public opinion, can impress their desires upon their representatives, and see that those desires are complied with and crystallized into action by this body.

Mr. President, the people of the United States are in thorough sympathy with the people of the entire world in their demand that secret diplomacy shall cease. I say, and I challenge contradiction, that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, while overturning the precedents of years dear to the hearts of those trained in diplomatic circles and along diplomatic lines, voices the demands and wishes of the united labor element, whether in labor unions or out of it, of the entire world. It forms the fundamental plank or platform in every union-labor declaration of this country, France, Great Britain, Germany, Russia, and every other civilized country on the face of the earth.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. FALL. I yield. I was going to yield the floor.

Mr. REED. No; there is just a question that I want to ask the Senator. The Senator speaks about the interest of union labor in having all diplomatic business conducted in public. Does union labor conduct its business in public, or is it conducted otherwise?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am not a member of a union labor organization. I would not apologize at all for it if I were. I do not know their methods of procedure. I presume that they conduct their business ordinarily within their lodge rooms. That is my general information. I suppose the Senator has the same information I have on the subject.

I am not, Mr. President, appealing to union labor or asking for the support of union labor. Were I a candidate for any office I would ask the support of citizens without reference to the fact that they might or might not belong to a union labor organization. I have spoken heretofore with reference to union labor. But the fact remains that the labor of the world will control the world and every government that is in it, and the fact remains, Mr. President, that, speaking of the union labor organizations of the United States, there have been no more patriotic utterances nor more patriotic acts from any citizen or class of citizenry within the United States, than we have had and seen from the union labor of the United States during this great crisis. I therefore think their wishes ought to be thought of and listened to when expressed.

Mr. KNOX. May I inquire of the Senator from New Mexico, upon the hypothesis that the negotiation of the very gravest of our international difficulties has been remitted from the Department of State to Mr. Justice Brandeis and to Col. House, as is so positively asserted in the article which the Senator has read, should not the amendment we are now considering and which requires diplomatic negotiations to be conducted in public be so widened as to embrace those gentlemen? We do not want to do the futile thing of setting a trap to catch the mice of the Senate while the lions of diplomacy are raging about.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is undoubtedly correct, I think, and has stated in very clear language what has passed through my mind; but I may say to the Senator that at a time before his entrance into the Senate in his present term the Senator from

New Mexico had inquired, through a resolution unanimously adopted, introduced by himself, of the administration with reference to reports made by the personal representatives of the President upon other foreign matters and that was met with a flat refusal to render any report whatsoever and give any information whatsoever with reference to the report, or even the facts, ascertained by his personal representatives and upon which apparently, as far as we know, he formed his judgment, the judgment of this great Nation, upon a matter which, in my mind, was of the most serious character and which will inevitably affect the national history, possibly the future of this country, for many generations.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I assume, although the Senator from New Mexico did not state it, his resolution was introduced to inquire into the diplomacy of the present administration.

Mr. FALL. Yes; and I understand there was a flat refusal, although the Senate unanimously asked for the information.

Mr. KNOX. I desire to ask the Senator from New Mexico if that is not the most secret kind of secret diplomacy, and whether it is in consonance with what the President stated to Congress in his address made some weeks or months ago?

Mr. FALL. It seems to me that the fundamental weakness of the present administration is its absolute refusal to take the people of the United States into its confidence with reference to foreign relations which will inevitably leave their mark upon the history of this country for unknown generations. More than that, it is the absolute refusal of the administration to impart to the Congress of the United States for its consideration matters, or facts, rather, without which it is impossible for the Congress to act intelligently within its constitutional duties, and the consequence of which refusal is that it is necessary simply for the Congress of the United States to follow blindly the dictum coming from the White House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming that the method employed by the executive department is as secret as indicated, it must commend itself to those who are in favor of secret diplomacy, because it is the consummation of the system of secret diplomacy. Therefore if the Senate is opposed to such a system, it has imposed upon it no other duty than that of taking care of its own procedure. If the Senate goes upon record in favor of that portion of the diplomatic affairs with which it has to do being in the open, it will be in a position to complain of the secret diplomacy of the executive department; and until it does go upon record in favor of that proposition it has no just criticism to offer against the secret diplomacy of the executive department.

Mr. FALL. It is for the reason just stated by the Senator from Idaho that I am so cordially and earnestly supporting the proposition which he has advanced here, that all treaties should be considered and discussed in the open before the ratification of such treaties.

Mr. President, I had no intention to detain the Senate to this length when I rose. While I am on my feet I will refer to a class of citizens of the United States who demanded open diplomacy, who demanded the doing away with all the rules of secret diplomacy, who demanded that the foreign relations of this country and its people should be considered in the open. I refer to this simply because union labor is, of course, organized and speaks through its committees or through resolutions regularly adopted and which have publicity. I can say, sir, that I assume to speak for the great unorganized mass, almost every man, woman, and child in the United States, when I say that they demand to know how their foreign relations are being dealt with, and while they have confidence in their Representatives or they would not elect them, while they are willing to leave their Representatives finally to place the seal of approval upon a treaty or to conduct foreign negotiations, yet they demand to be informed as to the facts and as to the reasons for their final action before their hands are bound irrevocably.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a few years ago a lot of the best-intentioned people on earth went about declaring that war was a wicked thing; that armies ought to be disbanded and navies dismantled. They were absolutely right. There should be no armies and there should be no navies. But, Mr. President, the nation that goes without an army and navy when other nations possess armies and navies is as foolish as the man who being surrounded by wild beasts throws away his gun. Before there is any sense in talking about national disarmament there must be an absolute and unqualified agreement for international disarmament. We can afford to lay aside our arms and our preparations when the rest of the world has done the same thing, but if we lay down our arms and cease our preparations before the rest of the world has done the same thing we will find ourselves in exactly the same situation that the combination of insanity, idiocy, and anarchy known as Bolshevik found itself when it laid down its arms only to instantly feel the boot of Germany upon its neck.

I want to apply what I have said to the case in hand. It is all well and good to talk about the virtues of open-handed daylight diplomacy. True, there ought to be in this world nothing but open, daylight diplomacy. Every nation ought to deal with international questions so that all the world can see and the common justice of mankind can pass upon the merits of each case.

But, Mr. President, when the rest of the world has secret diplomacy, if we do not keep our secrets we will speedily find ourselves in as bad a condition as would be a man who, being engaged in playing a game of cards, should lay his hand face up on the table while all his antagonists hold theirs concealed.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho is all right if you will amend the amendment by adding "Provided, That this amendment shall not take effect until the rest of the world adopts open diplomacy." Until you have added that amendment you are doing an utterly foolish thing—a thing that may wreck the fortunes of this country in some great crisis of the future.

The advocacy of it is exactly upon the same logical parallel as was the advocacy of universal peace, of disarmament. Right? Yes. Fair? Yes. Just? Yes. There should be no wars, there should be no bloodshed, but as long as there are nations which will make war we must prepare ourselves to meet those nations.

It is right also to have fair and open diplomacy, and as long as all the world will follow that course we should follow it, but until the world does take that course we will, by pursuing it, place ourselves at a disadvantage, and it may be a tragic disadvantage, a ruinous disadvantage.

While I am on my feet I want to express my opinion of the whole rule proposed. I am patiently awaiting the day when some Senator will propose to amend the Lord's Prayer or to change the Ten Commandments, and to set aside the Apostolic Creed. The order of the day is change, and the formula is that "all change means progress." So we are engaged in the business of changing. But all change does not mean progress. Fortunate, indeed, is the change that makes for progress. The majority of changes make for disintegration and decay. This world is running as it is because certain great laws control.

Humanity is existing as it is because it has conformed to certain great natural rules and laws, and while there is always room for improvement, it nevertheless follows that a change, unless it is made with great care, generally runs counter to something that has been established because it had merit and virtue. Before you change any law or any rule of human conduct you ought carefully to consider two propositions—what are the evils and virtues of the present conditions and what are the evils as well as the virtues of that which is proposed as a substitute for the existing conditions.

It is easy enough to pick out all the faults of the system you have and to so assemble them as to present a very black picture. It is also easy to assemble the imaginary virtues of something that has never been tried and to present a very bright picture, and by contrasting it with the black picture to lead the thoughtless into a desire for change. But nine times out of ten the evils of the present have been exaggerated and the virtues of the new fail to materialize.

We had a system in the Senate which permitted filibustering. We abolished filibusters, and there is some question whether, after all, that step will not bring us as much evil as it brought good, for there is in the very power of a minority to stop the wheels of legislation for a time a great potentiality for good. There was, however, some evil in the system. The question as to whether there should have been a change was dependent largely upon the exercise that had been made of the power to withhold consent to legislation.

I freely gave my consent to a rule which gave to two-thirds of the membership of this body the power to end debate. We have worked under that same rule for a number of months, and in that number of months nothing has happened that has borne the slightest resemblance to an attempt to obstruct legislation. There has been no obstruction of legislation and effective obstruction of legislation is not possible to-day, in my opinion, but there has been some reasonable freedom of debate, and there should be.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that during what might be denominated the war sessions of this Congress there have been more legislative enactments within the same length of time than there have been in any other legislative body in the history of this Republic if not the entire history of the world?

Mr. REED. I think that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. KING. And, if I may ask one further question, is it not a fact that as to some of the measures which we rushed through under the whip and spur, perhaps, of public opinion, that the legislation would have been better and wiser if there had been more deliberation and consideration?

Mr. REED. Well, I think everybody must agree to that. How can anyone doubt that proposition?

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], with his usual care, prepared and presented to the Senate a list of the important measures that have passed within the last eight or nine months, and showed that some of those measures had passed with such slight debate that it could not be claimed that they received even respectful consideration in this body. He did not use that expression; that is my own expression; but he stated the time when each of the bills was introduced and the time when it was passed, and the statement of the facts warrants the conclusion that I have drawn.

I call attention to the fact of the appropriation for the aeroplane program of $640,000,000. The bill for that purpose was passed on this floor without a single statement in regard to it, I believe, except one that I made, that did not exceed 10 minutes in length. That does not indicate that anything I said caused the quick passage of the bill. It does show that the Senate so desired to carry through a great aerial program that we were ready to appropriate the money without even pausing to consider. Senators, we were all too ready.

If we had spent three or four days in debating that bill and insisted upon the creation of a proper tribunal or board to carry into execution its powers, if we had insisted upon putting upon that commission or board men who were skilled in the art of aviation, I say to you we should have had aeroplanes in France by the hundreds and the thousands before this hour. We acted with an improvidence and haste that was disgraceful at that time; I admit my part in it, and we are suffering for it to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. In one moment I will yield. We are just beginning now to emerge from the clouds into the sunlight. There is, however, a great need of improvement yet.

Now I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My recollection is, Mr. President—and I want to ask the Senator if that also is not his recollection—that the reason there was no debate on that great measure was that the Senate was informed by members of the committee or by the administration, through certain Senators, that it was exceedingly desirable in the public interest to have that measure passed that very day and that it would be considered against public policy to debate the whys and wherefores, and so forth, in connection with the measure?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should hardly want to go that far as to entirely concur in the statement, but I do say there was a general sentiment in the Senate that we should pass everything quickly, believing, as patriots—and I hope we are all that—that there should not be a moment's time lost in furnishing the sinews of war. Other great bills have passed here almost without debate. Now, I challenge any Senator on this floor to tell me a single bill that a majority of the Senate has favored that has been defeated by a filibuster of any kind since the rules were amended.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to go further and have any Senator suggest any bill that was ever defeated by a filibuster which the common judgment of the country did not afterwards say ought to have been defeated. I have gone pretty thoroughly into that proposition for the last 50 years, and I should like some one to say where a bill was ever defeated by a filibuster that it was not, in the judgment of the country afterwards, a wise thing to have done. Some two or three river and harbor bills were defeated; the force bill was defeated; and one or two other measures were defeated, all of which received practically the universal condemnation of the country thereafter.

Mr. REED. Well, there is one matter I have in mind that I think the Senator from Idaho would except; that is the bill to authorize the arming of merchant ships. I think we may say that bill also was defeated by a filibuster.

Mr. BORAH. Well, but, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment. That bill, however, if I recollect aright, was introduced only three or four days before the session expired by limitation of law, so that perhaps I ought not to say the opposition to it constituted a filibuster, but the length of the debate made a vote upon it impossible. The bill should have been introduced I thought then, and I think now, a few days earlier. If it had been, I am sure it would have passed. I am sure it would have passed if there had been two days more of the session.

Mr. BORAH. I think it was a mistake to have defeated that bill, but I was referring to measures which had become historic and upon which the history of the country has come finally to be written, those old measures which were defeated as to which the history of the country will tell you that in the judgment of the country they were properly defeated. I do not know of a single instance which is an exception, unless it be the bill to which the Senator from Missouri has just referred, and, of course, that is a very late matter.

Mr. REED. Well, the result of that was the amendment of our rules, and if the rule had been then as it is now the Senate would have been able to have obtained a vote, for a great many more than two-thirds of the Members of the Senate desired a vote, as was shown by the signatures, I think, of 76 Senators to the round robin.

Now, Mr. President, I want to present this matter from a slightly different angle in just a brief way. There are many who argue that an hour and a half is long enough to argue any case. I will agree that it is a rare thing in a lawsuit that a man can not fully present a case in an hour and a half if he knows how to talk well and talks to the point. I have, however, seen exceptions to that where the evidence was very voluminous and had to be recapitulated to the court or the jury. But what are the conditions in a lawsuit? The argument does not begin until the evidence is all in. Days are taken in the presentation of the evidence. As you proceed in the case, disputed points of law and of fact are argued to the court.

When you get through with all of your evidence, the instructions of the court usually narrows the point for decision to a few, often to a single, question. That one point is a simple question of fact. That is generally true of suits at law. Of course a somewhat different situation is presented in equity actions, but even there the rules of court and the rules of law all tend to simplify the issue. Hence the lawyer is generally in his argument required to cover only one or two points.

But what is the character of work performed by a legislative body like the Senate? Here we are settling questions of fact not by evidence that has been introduced, but by evidence that has been gathered by the speaker. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just stated that a few days ago he delivered an address in which he covered the legislative experience with reference to filibusters for 50 years. That speech was not only in the nature of an argument but in the nature of a presentation of the facts and of the evidence; and every moment he had to take in order to cite historic precedents was that much deducted from the time he had in which to make his argument and draw his conclusions.

I have heard arguments made upon the floor of the Senate to which very few Senators listened, and which, because they contained long statements of fact, lasted six or eight hours, yet those statements of fact constituted the case the Senate had to decide. I have also witnessed the fact that those arguments to which very few Senators had listened became the subject of examination, and in turn became the primal and decisive reason for a conclusion by this body.

Moreover, if we take the rule that is offered by my distinguished friend from Alabama—and this is almost the first time I have ever radically differed from him—if we take this proposed rule and undertake to apply it to the proceedings of this body, it will be found that it will put hobbles upon the Senate, which will make it impossible for the Senate to perform one of its most valuable functions. Let us see. The distinguished Senator who is the author of this measure spends five or six weeks of hard study preparing himself on a great tariff bill, a subject of which he is probably the greatest living master.

I am willing to sit at his feet and learn from him on questions of that kind. If he will undertake the investigation of a matter of that sort, I am willing to put aside everything except my final judgment upon the matter. He prepares for five or six weeks on a great tariff bill; he has studied every item and every detail; he has studied the conditions of foreign trade and commerce; he has studied the question of foreign production and wages; he has analyzed and determined the factor in production which is to be charged to machinery and that which must be charged to wages, and he has ascertained in the various countries of the world not merely the wage difference in dollars per day, but the wage differences measured by production. He has gone into the whole philosophy of that great question, and he has gathered also facts touching transportation and touching finance, all of which make a part of the mass of facts necessary to a conclusion. Then he rises here to make a speech in an hour and a half, and does not get well started until some Senator—the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] perhaps, who takes the opposite view, and who, in like manner, is a master of many details of this question—rises and asks him a question.

Debate ensues, and those who listen to that debate will get more real information than they will perhaps by studying the problem for weeks, because here will be two masters of the question debating the hard and difficult points. But there is not time for that. There is, in fact, not time for the Senator from Alabama to have one-half stated his views upon even one schedule of the bill, and consequently he can not yield. His time is soon exhausted, and when he seeks to enlighten us upon numerous points upon which he has prepared himself somebody objects and he is forced to his seat. Now, it simply will not do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to give an illustration on that point, I think I can show where he is in error. I have had some experience along that very line. I reported a tariff bill to the House of Representatives some years ago. The report which I submitted to accompany the bill covered the whole subject matter. It would have been impossible to have gone into the details of the bill on the floor, and I did not attempt to do so, but I covered those questions in the report which I submitted to the House and which was printed and ready for every Member to comment upon and to consider.

When it came down to the debate, under the rules of the House I was allowed one hour. Beyond a question, if I had asked for more time it would have been granted by unanimous consent. I explained the principle of the bill, but not the details, within one hour, and I did not ask the House for further time. As to the details of the report and of the bill, the main details were accepted; where there was objection, amendments were offered, and on those amendments the direct question was submitted and debated in the House, and in that debate on amendments I took part.

There was no cloture in the House during the consideration and passage of that measure, and yet, under the rules and training of the House, which had accustomed itself to presenting a case within a reasonable time, the House passed that bill in two weeks.

That is an illustration of how it works, and in that same way it may work here. If a great bill is presented, instead of the Senator in charge of it expecting to present in a speech his conclusions in the matter, he has full opportunity to make an ample and complete report on the details.

On the general principle on which the bill is based I think that a Senator can well present his case in an hour and a half; but if he can not do so, the Senator in charge of the legislation and reporting the bill is presumed to have a majority of the Senate with him; and under this rule, not in the original draft but in the draft as we have agreed to it, a majority of the Senate—of course, it can be done by unanimous consent, anyhow—a majority of the Senate on motion, without debate, can extend the time to such length as is desired.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to what has just taken place. Because of our method of doing business we have been able now at least to have the views of the Senator put sharply in contrast with the views that I have just been expressing. I shall, in turn, undertake to show the fallacy of his views, and when I am through the Senate at least will have the two opposing arguments.

The trouble with the view of the Senator from Alabama is that it is the view of the House of Representatives; it is their method of doing business. He properly and truthfully stated that the man who reports a bill has the opportunity to file his reasons, and that it is presumed he has a majority of the committee and the majority of the House with him. That is exactly the difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives.

In the House of Representatives the committees do the business, and the chairman of the committee does have an opportunity to present his views, and the minority of the committee may have an opportunity—a very poor one—to express theirs, in a document that mighty few people read. In the House, I believe, they do read them, because it is one of their chief methods of getting light; but here we do not want to indulge the presumption in favor of a bill because it comes out of a committee, and we do not want to deny to the other Members of the Senate the opportunity to express their views as fully as the chairman of the committee has expressed his.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. Just one moment. I have seen the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], when he was House leader, stand over there and manage those fights. He did it in a masterly way. He did it with the poise and the calmness and the keenness of a master of men. I saw Members of the House get up, and the Senator would say, "I yield to Mr. Smith 5 minutes"; again, "I yield to Mr. Jones 2 minutes"; and to somebody else 15 minutes, and so forth, apportioning the time as a ship captain short of rations might dole out crumbs to the starving. All that may be necessary in the House of Representatives, but nobody will claim to-day that the House of Representatives is a deliberate body.

The House of Representatives acts through committees. The chairmen of the committees do the business of the House. The Members caucus upon the important bills, and what is registered over there is the decree of a party.

I have no objection to that and no criticism of the House for that; I think it may be necessary on account of the large membership of the House; but I think it is equally necessary that there should be some body in this country where there is a greater freedom of debate, where party lines are not so closely drawn, where there may be an analysis of propositions as they are brought forward. Thus the two Houses working together form a complete and harmonious whole—the Senate, where the procedure is as I have just stated, and the House of Representatives, with its method. Each House should adhere to its own method. More than once I have seen the mistakes of the House of Representatives corrected here by debate. They make mistakes. Then, of course, I have seen them correct our mistakes. But the two Houses ought to run under two separate and distinct plans.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it occurred to me that while the Senator referred to his little colloquy with the Senator from Alabama a moment ago, and the lesson that he was going to draw from it, he lost sight of this fact: He calls attention only to the limitation of an hour and a half. This rule provides that by majority vote that time can be extended. Now, I have been in the Senate for a little over seven years and I have never yet seen a time, I believe, when, if a Senator asked for additional time, it would not have been cheerfully granted to him, whether he was on the majority side or the minority side, unless there was in progress what was known as a deliberate filibuster; and when that is attempted I think there ought to be a very strict limit upon debate. I have never known the Senator from Missouri to engage in a filibuster; but I am satisfied that if he came in here on any subject that was near to his heart and wanted further time it would be granted to him very graciously by both the majority and the minority Members.

Mr. REED. The trouble with the Senator's statement is that it puts him out of court. He says that there is an hour and a half limit, but that it can be extended by majority vote, and that it always will be extended; ergo, you have no rule and no limit. It gets you nowhere.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Ohio again defends the rule by saying that it is desirable to prevent filibustering; but, as I tried to point out yesterday, this rule is utterly helpless against a filibuster if a few determined men try to do it. With an unlimited right of amendment and unlimited motion you can not stop a filibuster with a rule like this.

Mr. REED. That is true. Of course it could be carried on in that way.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it certainly would not go along very far until it would be discovered whether it was a filibuster or not.

Mr. LODGE. There is nothing here to cut off the right of amendment.

Mr. KING. You could offer amendments forever, with 20 minutes debate on each one.

Mr. LODGE. You can multiply amendments indefinitely. If the Senator doubts my proposition, I refer him to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in charge of the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure that Senators can continue to present amendments, but I do not believe that would be done to a very great extent.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so, either; but to say that it will stop filibustering does not defend it; that is all.

Mr. POMERENE. It will not, perhaps, entirely stop it, but it certainly would reduce it to a minimum.

Mr. REED. There has been no filibuster since the rules were amended. There is not a man in the Senate Chamber who will say that there has been a filibuster or anything approximating a filibuster; and, with that situation, now the demand is made that we shall adopt a rule of this kind.

Now, let me appeal to the Senator from Ohio. You have a proposition here that there shall be only 20 minutes' debate upon an amendment. What kind of an amendment? If it is an amendment as to form, well and good; but an amendment may be a thousand times more important than the bill. Let me call the Senator's attention to one.

We had the food-control bill here. While the food-control bill was being debated the Senator from Ohio and certain other Senators upon the Interstate Commerce Committee were working almost night and day trying to do something to solve the coal question, and they brought in here an amendment, so called. It was in form an amendment because it was attached to another bill, but it was in fact an entirely new bill. It created new powers of the most drastic and revolutionary character. It authorized the President of the United States to control every coal mine in the United States. It was so construed afterward as to give the right to control every coal dealer, down to the small retailer. It was further construed afterward to give the right to control the amount of coal any citizen could have in his cellar. It was further construed afterward to give the right to close the sawmills of the United States, that did not burn a pound of coal from one year's end to another, and to close the factories of the United States, that had coal in their bins. It was further construed finally to give the right in Washington, the capital of the country, to close the churches on Sundays and open the theaters. How long ought a thing of that kind to have been debated before it was passed? Yet it was an amendment. I confess that at the time the Senator offered his amendment the situation seemed so intolerable that I was willing to do almost anything, and I voted for that amendment; but shall we have only 20 minutes to discuss an amendment like that?

I have but little doubt that I can frame an amendment to the present resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States and stick it on as an amendment.

Let us have some sense about these things. What is the wrong that needs to be remedied? What has been the trouble here this summer? We have been passing bills so fast that the committees did not have time to properly prepare the bills and properly consider them. What have we suffered from—too much consideration, or too little consideration? You all know there has been too little consideration. We have passed enough undigested or half-digested legislation to turn the stomachs of ostriches, as it is already turning the stomachs of courts.

We passed an espionage act. We were urged to pass it in a hurry. There was not time in the Judiciary Committee to consider it properly. There were a lot of legislative impetuous hotspurs who were anxious to appear in the forum in charge of spectacular legislation. Finally some of the hasty laws got before the courts. Lawyers began to analyze it, and the first thing we knew the Department of Justice was up here saying: "Amend this thing. It does not mean anything."

The defects might have been discovered if there had been time taken here to consider the measures, if there had been time taken in the Judiciary Committee to consider it. I am a member of that committee, and I see its distinguished chairman [Mr. CULBERSON] sitting here, one of the great lawyers of this country; I venture the assertion that if the cry of haste had not been so insistent in our ears, he would have taken time to more thoroughly study more of these bills and would have found a lot of mistakes that the courts afterward were compelled to point out. If there is any lesson to be learned from recent legislative events, it is that there has been a lack of consideration, a failure to analyze.

"Oh," but somebody says, "the Senators do not stay here to listen to debates." That is true, but the proposed bill will not remedy that. The reform you need in the Senate is to get Senators who have enough interest to sit here and know what they are doing, and not stay in the cloakrooms and then come in and ask somebody else how to vote. That happens every day, and we have been working so fast here, legislatively, that we have not done our work right, and you all know it. There is not a man here who does not know it. There are two members of the Judiciary Committee sitting in front of me. I have served with them. They know it. They know that we did not take time to go to the library and get down the decisions, as we used to do.

They know that we did not take the time to get the standard works on the Constitution and examine the questions as we used to. They know that we sort of took a running jump at the thing, we guessed it off, and accordingly we made a lot of mistakes.

Constructions are given to some of these laws to-day that are appalling. Powers are being claimed under them that we never dreamed of. A food-control gentleman over here who qualified in one of the States by making 57 varieties of pickles has informed the good women of that State that he proposes to invade their homes and inventory their larders, and if they have more than 30 days' supply of anything he is going to send them to the penitentiary. I only cite that because it is one of the cases, not because it is a food-control matter. You find equally violent constructions placed upon other language.

This body ought to be a body where questions can be debated out. The mere pressure of the times puts limit enough on them. Since we entered the war I have seen men filled with ideas in regard to bills that they thought ought to be expressed pass them by because of the desire to delay no part of the public business.

What is the matter with the Senate of the United States that it must change everything? I am not so sure that we have not suffered from nearly every change we have made. I am not so sure that I was not mistaken when, for many years of my life, I urged the direct election of Senators. I am not so sure but that the intellectual and moral fiber of the Senate was better under the old régime. I do not say so, but I am not so sure about it. We had unlimited debate. It was abused once or twice or three times in an ordinary lifetime, and we made haste to change it; and so haste, haste, haste, is the order of the day. We have been making haste at the expense of efficiency.

Do you tell me, when I go into an airplane factory and see contracts where 2,000 machines of a certain kind were ordered, and see by the books where men have started to produce those machines, and then have seen where the order had been rescinded and another order made, and then see by the books where they had started to work upon the second type of machine, and then another order rescinding the second order, that that sort of haste is not waste? All change is not improvement; all haste is not progress.

What is the matter with our old rules? We have gotten along under them; and the answer to all of this complaint is in the words of the Senator from Ohio. He says that any Member can get an extension of time. Well, if any Member can get an extension of time, then you have no limitation upon time, and your rule is a dead letter. We know that we can end a filibuster under the present rule. We know that during this war the man who attempted a filibuster to stop important legislation would almost be torn in pieces.

There is no danger of it, and you know there is no danger of it. Let this thing alone. Let the Senate go along in its ordinary way. You may tinker with the best watch on earth until it will not keep time. If you have a good watch that has been keeping good time for a century, you had better let it alone and not try to put new wheels in it.

I will say frankly that I can give my accord to almost anything the distinguished Senator from Alabama brings into this body, because I have for him the very highest respect, but if you pass this rule you will find yourselves rescinding it after a while, I think. It will be like many other things that you attempt—it will bring no good result. We saved I have forgotten how many billions hours of time a little while ago by turning the clock back, but nobody has realized on that time up to date. Of course, we have not yet changed the names of days of the week. They did that over in France during the revolution, but I notice the French, having had their lessons in revolutions, have in the present great world conflict made less changes in their form and style of government and doing business than any other nation on earth.

And yet along the flame-swept line stand the French immovable almost as a rock, and when they do move back the ground in front of their lines is paved with German dead. They have not changed their form of government, and they have made a better showing than any other nation, and I say that with all respect for England. They have made a better showing than we have up to date; not a better showing, I believe, than we will make. But you are not going to win this war by passing resolutions. You are not going to win this war by changing the rules of the Senate. You are not going to win this war by anything fantastic or bizarre or peculiar. You are going to win this war when you have put about 5,000,000 Americans on the line; when you have given them trench mortars, so many you can not count them; when you have given them cannon more powerful than the adversary's; when you have made every foot of the line a nest of machine guns; when you have supplied them with poison gas more deadly than that which is poured forth from the German trenches and German shells. You are going to win this war when you have put metal and men enough upon that line, and nothing else will win it.

If we will just go on passing the necessary appropriation bills; if we will just go on attending to the country's business as well as we have been, learning each day how to do it a little better, profiting by our mistakes in the past; if we will only learn this important lesson that a mistake is easily made and hard to rectify, and that the time to rectify a mistake in a body like this is before you make it, if I may indulge in a sort of Irish bull; if we will but sit here in council and wisely deliberate; if we shall be less keen about passing bills and more keen about passing wise bills, we shall do, I hope, our full part. And if we do our full part, then we will strengthen the mighty thews of this mighty country; we will make our armies more invincible upon the field of battle, our fleet more powerful upon the waters of the ocean; but that, sir, requires thought, deliberation, and debate. But the song on the lips is not the old familiar "twinkle, twinkle, little star," but it is tinker, tinker, tinker, little statesman, tinker all the time; change something. Why do you want to change it? Like a child, you seem to want to see the wheels go round. If we must experiment, there are plenty of opportunities for experiments. It is not with legislation, it is not with the Constitution, it is not with principles of government, it is in the production of instruments of death that will meet the German instruments of death.

There I am willing to put our money in experiments, hoping that out of these experiments will come something that will enable us to crush the foe. But I am not willing to revise the rules of the Senate so as to compel the consideration of treaties in public because the Bolsheviki of Russia set the illustrious example. That is a fine example to be held up in this body! They demanded that all treaties should be open and public, and the first thing they did was to drag out the archives of Russia and parade them. While they were parading treaties Prussia was parading her armies. While they were exposing the secrets of dead diplomats Prussia was exposing the weakness of their military establishment. While they were foolishly saying, "We will play the great world game in accordance with the high principles of anarchy and the pure precepts of socialism and exalted doctrines of universal brotherhood," their antagonists were with bloody swords hacking their way through the helpless soldiery who were without leadership.

We are to have open consideration of treaties and every other nation in the world is to have secret treaties and secret negotiations. We are to tell all the world what we are doing and all we are thinking of doing, and they are to tell us nothing. We are to operate in daylight and agree only to fight when the sun is in the zenith and the air is clear, and they have the right to raid our country at midnight. We are to fight only with the most approved weapons, the edge of the sword dulled by gentility, but they are to fight with poisoned gas, with deadly shells, with all instrumentalities that perdition can devise and cruelty employ.

We are, however, to do business in the open. Why? Labor, we are told, especially of the Bolsheviki, the I. W. W. variety, demands it. Let me tell you that union labor in this country does not demand it. Union labor in this country is not in this war as union labor. The Republican Party is not making this war, and you, my distinguished colleagues of the other side, are not sitting here as Republicans, but as United States Senators. The Democratic Party is not making this war. We are sitting here like our brethren on the other side as Senators to do our duty. The Methodist Church is not making this war nor making demands of the Government in this war as an organization, nor the Baptist Church, nor the Presbyterian Church, nor the Catholic Church, nor the Unitarian Church, nor any other church. Their members are not in this war as Methodists or as Catholics or as Unitarians or as Presbyterians. Neither is the blacksmith, with his hardened muscles, who happens to belong to a blacksmiths' union in the war as a union man or as a blacksmith. He is here as an American citizen. The carpenter who belongs to a union is not in this war as a union man or as a carpenter, but he is here as an American citizen. So I might go through the catalogue of all the trades and avocations and list to you all the unions there are; I repeat these organizations are not in this war as organizations. Their members are in this war the same as you are. The son of the blacksmith and the son of the carpenter who are union men, and the son of the plumber and the son of the electrician, the son of the banker and the son of the preacher, all are in the war as American citizens. All are touching elbows on the same crimson field. All are dying in the same trenches, and back of them going up to high Heaven are the prayers of the mothers and fathers of them all, and they are not union-labor prayers or Methodist prayers. They are the prayers of humanity to the God that made us.

Union labor is making no such demand as that we shall at this hour expose our secrets to our enemies. In this war, above all times in history, we ought to be allowed to deal in secret. Our armies are straining on fields of carnage to drive back the enemies of civilization. Are we at this hour to be compelled to tell these onrushing fiends all we are doing? Union labor does not demand it, common sense does not demand it, right and justice do not demand it.

Think of it! You might as well pass a rule to-day that the commanders of the allies, including our own Pershing, must expose their battle plans to the enemy as to demand that our Government shall expose all the agreements that it may make with all our allies. Why not expose the secrets of the camp as the secrets of the council chamber to the German war lord? If we make a treaty with England and France for the purpose of strengthening our arms, for the purpose of enabling us to carry on this war, for the purpose of financing this war, must we send the Kaiser a copy so that he may be sure to know all we are doing? Such a proposition at such a time as this is insanity.

If it were proposed by any man except one above suspicion and he were indicted for attempting to aid and assist the enemy, exposing to him our Government's secrets, I would undertake to secure a conviction by any jury that could be impaneled in any State of the Union.

Now, just think of it. Just get all the cobwebs out of your head, all the prejudices out of your heart, and remember this is war time, a time when ships that sail the air are dropping bombs on cities where babes sleep on the bosoms of their mothers. It is a time when Germany is deliberately bombarding the hospitals of pain in which lie the thousands and tens of thousands of wounded men of France and England, and now hundreds, I doubt not, of our own boys—our own flesh and blood. At this time when they are being made the special mark for the destructive bombs of the gallant Prussian murderers, a time when the pale women who wear the glorious insignia of the Red Cross are being blown into atoms as upon their errands of mercy they go from cot to cot where wounded men lie dying.

At a time like this it is proposed in the Senate of the United States that we shall tell Germany and Austria and Hungary and Turkey if we make any agreement with England, any agreement with France, just what that agreement is. Meanwhile they meet at night in secret to plot further murders. Meanwhile they devise new instruments of destruction. Meanwhile they send out their diplomatic agents in secret; their spies cover the earth and act through subterranean passages. At such a time as this it is proposed that America shall expose her plans and agreements between herself and her allies.

Do you think if that is the case that England will dare make a treaty with us, that France will dare make a treaty with us during this war? Do you think if we pass this amendment that France or England or Italy dare deal with us by way of any treaty, knowing full well that all they may undertake to do will be spread open, that every treaty will be exposed to the kindly glances of the beloved Kaiser, so that he may be prepared to meet it all and prevent it?

You may seek to avoid that argument as much as you please; that is where we logically come. It is on a par with the propaganda in Russia, which started with the assumption that everybody ought to be good and everybody ought to quit fighting. So they quit fighting and undertook to be good only to become slaves.

Why, these are war times, Senators. These are times when the Government has to exercise powers that are unusual, as we all know. It is a time when Woodrow Wilson must be dealing directly with the Governments of other nations. It is a time when they must have thousands of secrets. I wish I might know more about what is going on; but I realize the fact that if I knew others would be also entitled to know, and if five or six hundred Members of Congress know all that is going on some information will get outside Congress and a great many things may be defeated. We have to repose some confidence in the executive branch of this Government. Yet I heard it stated on this floor to-day that every bit of our foreign diplomacy ought to be laid before the world.

For the Senator who brought in the main resolution I have already expressed my respect. For the Senator who is the author of this amendment I entertain not only respect but a profound regard which I feel for but few men. The principle of doing things openly and in public is a glorious and a splendid principle; that is the light which dazzles the intellectual vision of this great thinker. But, sir, a nation can not apply that principle until other nations accept it. Likewise a nation can not lay down its arms if its enemies continue to hold theirs ready to spring at its throat. I am willing my country shall disarm when all the rest of the world likewise disarms. Likewise when all the nations of the world perform their diplomatic acts in the open, so that we know what they are doing as well as they know what we are doing, I am willing to adopt the amendment. But at this time in the world's history, with war waging about us, to declare that we will make our treaties in the open while all the rest of the world, and especially our enemies, deal in the dark is, I repeat, as foolish as for the man engaged in a game of cards to lay his hand upon the table while all the rest hold theirs concealed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for again trespassing upon its time. My only excuse for doing so is my great interest in the amendment which I have offered. I may not say anything of sufficient moment to interest my colleagues, but my deep conviction leads me to make another effort for the success of the amendment.

I feel, after listening to the very remarkable and very able presentation of the other side of the question by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who is even powerful when he is in error, some things ought to be said in an attempted reply, and which I believe if properly said and effectively said would be a complete reply to some of the arguments advanced against this proposition. I know there is a full reply.

The Senator's argument is based upon the proposition that we must not proceed to deal with these international matters in the open until such time as the other nations of the earth shall have accepted this policy and consented to be bound by it; that we must wait until the dynasties of Europe see fit to make open or public their arrangements or combinations before committing ourselves to a proposition which we believe to be dangerous prior to that time. That policy would be the end of the fight for open diplomacy. Unless we or some one leads the way and forces open diplomacy, it will never come. Without secret diplomacy the dynasties of Europe can not exist. When they fight for it they are fighting for existence.

I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that there is now going forward in every nation of Europe this same discussion and this same controversy. There is the same debate being carried on in the English Parliament, in France, and the same discussion is being carried on among the people even of the central powers. It is advancing to a burning issue among the peoples of Europe who believe at this hour that they are the victims of secret diplomacy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not the demand in Great Britain, where it is most agitated, for the right of Parliament to ratify a treaty? The demand is not that it should be done in public, but the demand is that the representatives of the people shall be permitted to pass upon the ratification.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator is in error. They demand that it shall be done in open Parliament.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am mistaken, then. I have never heard the demand couched in that way. The only demand I have seen is that Parliament instead of His Majesty should be permitted to ratify treaties.

Mr. BORAH. Even if that were true the Senator will see at once that is another advance toward publicity, giving into the hands of those who represent the people a say with regard to treaties. But if the Senator will read the debates he will see that those who are contending for Parliament to have to do with it are basing it upon the proposition that Parliament and those whom they represent, the people of England, shall know what their relationships are to the other nations. There is not a suggestion in the debate that I have ever seen which intimates that Parliament should close its doors when these things are being considered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator, has it not been argued in behalf of the proposed reform in Great Britain that they want to have this reform as the United States has already enjoyed it? Do they not cite the United States as an example in which the legislative body is required to ratify the acts of the President?

Mr. BORAH. No. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that Mr. Trevelyan and Mr. Ponsonby, the advocates of this proposition, base their arguments upon the message of the President of the United States. They started out in their argument with his message as their text and contended that it was the principle which they should undertake to have incorporated in their system, to wit, open diplomacy. Mr. Balfour in answering that proposition undertook to contend that the President of the United States did not mean open diplomacy; that he did not mean that it should be carried on before the public or that the public should be informed in regard to it. He undertook to put a construction on it adverse to the construction which was put upon it by those who were advocating it. The issue was clearly made in the debate that it was to be discussed openly that both Parliament and the people might know all the facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator claim that the President of the United States supports his proposition for the abolition of executive sessions in consideration of treaties?

Mr. BORAH. Of course I am not authorized to speak for the President of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator believe that when the President of the United States condemned secret diplomacy he referred to the sort of diplomacy which the United States has followed since the Constitution was adopted?

Mr. BORAH. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking the Senator. He is undertaking to construe the President's position as one in favor of the abolition of executive sessions of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I do not assume, of course, that the President was suggesting to the Senate of the United States that it should change its rules with reference to open sessions; but I say that the Senate of the United States is a part of the diplomatic machinery of the United States, and that secrecy upon its part would necessarily be in contravention of the open-diplomacy principle for which the President contends. No treaty can ripen into a binding obligation as the result of any diplomacy upon the part of the United States until this body acts upon it; therefore, if we are going to have, as the President says, no secret understandings or no private understandings of any kind between the nations of the earth, and that all diplomacy shall be in the public view, it must necessarily follow that the entire proceedings from beginning to end shall be public.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all. Does the Senator from Idaho claim that the United States has ever had a secret understanding with any nation on the earth?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am rather surprised at the Senator's assertion, because it is a notorious fact that immediately upon the ratification of a treaty the seal of secrecy is taken from it, and it is just as public as is any act of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely, Mr. President; but you come back to the same proposition. Assuming that that is true, for the sake of the argument, that that is done in every instance—I do not desire to discuss some particular treaties which I have in mind, because they are still binding upon us—but I will say this, and I will say in a general way, that treaties have been made by the United States with other Governments which were kept secret until negotiations were attempted to be had with interested parties in order to bring them into line; they were kept secret so long as the United States thought it was deriving any benefit from keeping them secret; and if it had thought it was wise or necessary or beneficial to have kept them secret longer or for an interminable length of time, it could have done so, because treaties are made public by an act of the Senate; they do not become public except by an affirmative act of this body.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will take the position that the Senate should immediately remove the seal of secrecy from a treaty when it is adopted, he will be taking a position against secret diplomacy. Secret diplomacy is carrying into effect and keeping in effect to the ignorance of the people a binding agreement.

Mr. BORAH. Well, is not secret diplomacy also making any contract which binds the people without the people knowing anything about its having been made?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not; because the Senate is just as much a part of the treaty-making power of the United States as is the President.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We might as well require the President of the United States to negotiate in public a treaty with another nation as to require the Senate to take its part in the negotiation in public.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Nebraska contend, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the President of the United States is not in favor of the executive department negotiating in the open with reference to treaties, alliances, and so forth?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is absolutely preposterous to think that the President of the United States would sit on a hill and in the view of the whole world undertake a negotiation with another Government; and it is just as preposterous to suppose that the United States Senate, which has a part in the negotiation, which has a part in framing a treaty, which has a part in giving it its phraseology, and which receives secret communications from the President, should go into the open.

Mr. BORAH. Let us see what the President in his message in reference to this matter says, and give him the benefit of candor with reference to his views. The President says:

Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

What does the President mean by that language?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that the President is entirely satisfied with the processes which the United States has had since the Government was established; that the negotiation shall be carried on by the President; that the treaty shall be formed through his negotiators; that, when it is formed, it shall be sent to the Senate; that the Senate shall refer it to its Committee on Foreign Relations; that the Committee on Foreign Relations shall report it back to the Senate; that it shall remain here at least a day; that thereafter, upon another day, it shall be considered by the Senate; that the Senate shall take part in changing its phraseology, in amending the treaty, and in sending it back to the President with those amendments; and that after that shall have been done the treaty shall be published to the world, but not before then.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska can not certainly arrive at that conclusion from the President's language. The Senator must have some subterranean information which does not come to the public by virtue of any language which has been used by the President, because this address says:

Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at—

If the President is going to negotiate a treaty secretly, and we are going to discuss and ratify it secretly, we shall not openly arrive at "open covenants of peace."

Mr. HITCHCOCK rose.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment until I get through. This address says:

Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

What is diplomacy if it is not the very thing about which the Senator from Nebraska has been speaking? It is the exchange of views, the exchange of notes between the different nations by which they finally arrive at an understanding. That understanding is incorporated into the form of a treaty. The treaty comes to the Senate of the United States, and the Senate acts upon it. That constitutes the machinery of diplomacy by which we finally arrive at binding obligations; and the President says that from the first step to the last, diplomacy "shall proceed always frankly and in the public view."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And so it has in the history of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. No; it has not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The President is attacking the diplomacy of Europe in that case; the fact that two nations are negotiating is secret; that it is not known. In the United States the fact that two nations are negotiating is known; the men are appointed by the President; the fact that negotiations are pending has been universally known.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is a mistake upon the part of the Senator from Nebraska. There have been numerous treaties made, so far as the Executive is concerned, from the beginning of the Government down to this time, in which there was no knowledge whatever of the transaction upon the part of the public until the contracting powers had agreed among themselves; and there have been numerous treaties made by the United States in which the people knew nothing until those treaties were ratified. They may know although in many instances they do not know that negotiations are proceeding. But the terms, conditions, and obligations, what the treaty is, what is proposed as a treaty, they know nothing about it until it is a binding obligation. It has been said by foreign writers that our diplomacy exceeds in secrecy that of the Governments of Europe.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator state the date of the message from which he is reading?

Mr. BORAH. Its date is the 8th of January, 1918.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho takes the extraordinary position that the President of the United States is indirectly attacking the method by which treaties have been made in the United States ever since the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I take the position, Mr. President, that the method by which we have made treaties should be changed and that position is supported fully by the President's language.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator is also taking the position that the President is attacking the method which is used by the United States, instead of attacking the secret method which is used in Europe.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if I can understand the English language, that is precisely what the President is doing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not see in it any reference to our method; and anyone with a knowledge of the situation must appreciate the fact that the President is entirely satisfied, as the great bulk of the American people are, with the present method.

Mr. BORAH. Let us see. The President says that—

The program of the world's peace, therefore, is our program, and that program, the only possible program, as we see it, is this—

And then follows what I have already read.

That is the first proposition which the President states, and every newspaper clipping which I have been able to see from England took precisely the same view of this matter as I do. The Senator from Nebraska and Mr. Balfour are the only gentlemen I have heard of as construing it in any other way than as a suggestion upon the part of the President of the United States that the diplomatic machinery be changed from secret operation to open operation.

If the President had not used the word "diplomacy" there would be room for the contention as the Senator from Nebraska is undertaking to make it, but he uses the word which covers the entire transaction from the first step to the close of the transaction. When the President makes his first overture to another power for a treaty, that is the first step in diplomacy; when we here in the Senate ratify the treaty, that is the last step in diplomacy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho, then, claim that the President of the United States is condemning himself?

Mr. BORAH. I have made no such contention as that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Idaho has stated that the President takes the first step and the Senate takes the last step, and he is also contending that the President maintains that we should be open. Now, then, the Senator is taking the absurd position, I think, of maintaining that the President is virtually condemning his own practices in all the recent treaties, for there is no more reason why the Senate should act in the open than that the President should do so if they are both engaged in the same undertaking.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Nebraska contend that the President has been acting in violation of this suggestion?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I think the President is attacking European diplomacy, which has produced wars, while American diplomacy has produced no wars. Our treaties are public as our laws are public, whereas European treaties have been secret and have been maintained in secret for years.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, the President of the United States is not saying anything about the publication of treaties at all. He is referring to the steps by which we "arrive at" covenants. He says nothing about covenants after they are concluded, he speaking about how we shall proceed while we are making them. Now, we can reject the President's policy if we wish, but we ought not to trifle with our own intellects by trying to explain it away. He does not discuss the subject of making them public at a certain time. What he says is that diplomacy shall be frankly in the public view and that all understandings arrived at shall be in the public view. What does the Senator understand by the words "arrived at." Does he think that the President simply meant that after an understanding had been arrived at then it should be made public?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Well, that is not what he says.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think so.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon. The President says "open covenants of peace openly arrived at."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I desire to ask the Senator a question for information. Does that refer so much to the manner of adopting a treaty as to the initial steps in the preparation of a treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, would the Senator take the position that the first steps, the first negotiations, should be open and the final steps should be closed?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that that is not the question. The President never had in his mind the question as to how the Senate shall ratify or how it shall reject a treaty; but he had in his mind the fact that wars in this world have come about by secret treaties which were never published anywhere and about which the peoples of neither nation involved knew anything. Now, in speaking to foreign nations, he says that in the making of treaties notice should be given to the people of the nations involved in order to prevent wars growing out of the secret treaty arrangements. No war ever came from any treaty which the United States entered into with any other nation under our form of government.

Mr. BORAH. No; but we are in a war now by reason of the fact that other nations practiced secret diplomacy and made secret treaties.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is what the President was talking about.

Mr. BORAH. Well, then, we will argue in a few moments whether the Senate of the United States is assisting the propaganda in Europe for open diplomacy if it adopts the proposition of secret diplomacy. Now, let us see. Here is another expression from the President which may throw light upon the question for the benefit of his supporters on the other side who seem to be somewhat confused as to his language at this particular juncture. The President says:

> It will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind.

That certainly commits us, not the nations of Europe alone, but the United States, to the principle that there shall be no secret understandings of any kind, and that there shall not be at any time during the processes of peace any secrecy upon the part of the nations in arriving at an understanding with reference to peace.

Mr. HITCHCOCK rose.

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment, until I get through with the entire paragraph. The President further says:

> The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interests of particular governments and likely at some unlooked-for moment to upset the peace of the world.

Then read in connection with that the language which he used which follows immediately after and tell me what he meant. Is the President of the United States candid before the world? I hold to the affirmative and that he meant precisely what he said.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if the Senator has no doubt about that, he is in the same attitude of mind that I am.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Without having seen any statement about it, and without having had any interview with the President about it, I doubt whether the question of his candor ought to be based merely on the interpretation of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator thinks the President entirely candid, then we have no controversy on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think he is entirely candid, but I think the Senator misconstrues the whole purpose the President had in mind in speaking as he did. There is no question about his candor; there is no question about his opposition to secret diplomacy; but the question is, What is secret diplomacy?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, what led the President to declare against secret diplomacy?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. He had seen wars constantly arising, but not because of our manner of making treaties.

Mr. BORAH. That is a form of superlative egotism which belongs to a particular class of the American people who think they can indulge in the same practices as the other nations of the world and escape from the evils which follow those practices in other countries. A bad system will work its evil effects here in time the same as elsewhere.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I deny that America has indulged in those practices, and the Senator is not justified, so far as diplomacy is concerned, in stating that the United States has ever practiced secret diplomacy. Certainly, to my knowledge, at least, it has not done so.

Mr. BORAH. In order that we may arrive at a proper conclusion as to the President's views, does the Senator think, then, when the President of the United States was speaking as President of the United States to the American Congress that he was not speaking with reference to what we would do or what we should do, but with reference to what Europe should do? Does he think the President is in favor of open diplomacy in Europe and secret diplomacy in the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably the President was speaking about what all nations should do; but I can see nothing in anything the President said in that connection that involved the question as to how a treaty entered into, with all the publicity or all the secrecy you please, should be discussed by the Senate. Every treaty to which the United States is a party must be ratified by the Senate; it is not a treaty until it goes through this body by an affirmative vote, and when it does it is a treaty that binds us. I do not see anything in the Senator's argument reduced to its lowest terms—and I say it with all respect to his great ability—if you follow it to its last analysis except a plea for a referendum vote on treaties.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let us get back to what the President said. I want to know from the majority side of the Chamber just how they construe the President's language. I had supposed that I was in harmony with the President's views, and I still believe I am. Now, will the Senator from Arizona listen for just a moment to this language——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Gladly.

Mr. BORAH. I can not imagine language being more explicit. The President says:

> Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at.

Not treaties or covenants secretly arrived at and later published as the majority side now wants to believe. We will be at the peacemaking, I trust, and we will be a powerful factor there; and does not the Senator understand that the President undertook to say that when the United States sits about the peace table with the nations of the earth the United States, together with the other nations, shall openly, in the presence of the entire world, arrive at covenants of peace?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no doubt of it; and I think that was the whole purpose of the President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK rose.

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment. That is one thing we have agreed upon. We have settled the proposition that the President, speaking for the United States, undertook to say that no covenants of peace should be arrived at in any other way than by open discussion. Now, second:

> After which—

That is, after covenants of peace are openly arrived at—

> After which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always—

Now, what is "diplomacy?" And what is the meaning of the word "always?" Diplomacy is the method by which we arrive at a treaty. It is the machinery by which a treaty is formed before it is submitted to the Senate for ratification—> diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view. Always does not mean "sometimes," but at all times—not in the public view part of the time, but all the time.

Do not put the President of the United States at this time in any other position than as meaning, whether it is sound or unsound—and I think it is sound—that every single step from the first to the last shall be in the open public view. He is going to "arrive at" the covenants publicly, and he is going to insist that all diplomatic proceedings shall be not in part, not a portion of the time, but at all times in the public view.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator really mean that? Does he mean that the President advocates, in case a treaty is pending between the United States and Great Britain, that the negotiators of that treaty shall sit in public, in the presence of newspaper men and a gallery, and shall discuss the negotiations of that treaty in public?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it means publicity as opposed to secrecy. When the President made his proposition to the world with reference to peace and negotiations between the different nations of the earth, he made them from this rostrum here or in the other House, and he presented 14 propositions, which were submitted on the initiative of the President of the United States, as a basis in arriving at covenants of peace, and they were made to all the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was very proper; but when the negotiators between the two countries sit down to negotiate a treaty does the Senator seriously say that the President advocates the admission of the general public and representatives of the press to witness the negotiations?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir; I say that is precisely what the President says.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, the Senator goes beyond any reason that I can possibly discuss with equanimity.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator to take up the public press of England and read what the press of that country has to say on this question. I could bring clippings here which I have gathered and read them by the half hour and show that not a single paper undertakes to put any other interpretation upon the President's words. It is my words, I suspect, that has disturbed the Senator's equanimity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that I think he has taken the only logical horn of the dilemma that he could take, because there is just as much reason why the President should carry on his negotiations in the full public eye as there is why the Senate should carry on its consideration of treaties in the full public eye.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that logically the Senator has taken the proper position; but it seems he has reduced himself to the most absurd situation in maintaining it.

Mr. BORAH. I am following the great moral leader in his fight for democratic diplomacy.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if his committal is unalterable?

Mr. BORAH. I say that in this particular discussion I am supporting the policy of the President in regard to open diplomacy. I shall always support him when I think he is right, and oppose him when I think he is wrong. I do not believe that there is any Senator on this side of the Chamber who does not accept the interpretation which I have put upon the President's message. Does the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who has had a vast amount of experience with reference to construing overtures between countries and the niceties of language, and so forth, understand that the President is in favor of secret diplomacy according to this language? Nobody believes that. No, my friends; you have got to find some other reason for voting against this amendment. You can not justify your vote against it upon the theory that the President has not candidly, openly, frankly, and unmistakably indorsed open diplomacy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that the President is going to follow the position which the Senator from Idaho says he has taken? Does he think that the President of the United States is going to have his negotiators sit in a public hall and discuss a proposed treaty in public with the representatives of Europe if they could be induced to do so?

Mr. BORAH. I would naturally infer—think so—from his language.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, if the Senator takes such a position, there is no room for discussion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the view the Senator from Idaho takes as to the attitude of the President. I have forgotten the date when the President used the words which the Senator is quoting. Will the Senator tell me the date?

Mr. BORAH. January 8, 1918.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator any information as to whether the Chief Executive has changed his mind on that matter since then?

Mr. BORAH. No; Mr. President, I have not, and I can not believe that he has changed his view.

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be a very unusual circumstance if he had not.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I do not care to go off into a discussion of that proposition; but here is the statement which was made and upon which the President committed himself before the whole world. I have had no intimation, except the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, that the President has modified his views; I should be astounded if he has modified his views, and I shall be very much surprised if he does modify his views. This is a great principle; it is indispensible to the world's peace; it is a part of the fight for democracy; and I would be sorry to think that the President has changed his view. I want him to stand on this sublime principle. It will go far toward putting an end to all war, and it will finally drive every royal family in Europe from power. But whether the President has or shall change, I feel sure enough of myself to assure you all that I will not change.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One of the most recent treaties negotiated and ratified by the Senate was the treaty with Denmark, by which the United States acquired the Danish West India Islands as a military necessity. Does the Senator take the position that that treaty should have been negotiated by the representatives of Denmark and the United States in a public hall, with the representatives of all nations present?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, Mr. President, we should not have invited all the nations of the earth to a little transaction which consisted of purchasing an island down in the West Indies, but I would have carried on the negotiations with Denmark in an open, public way. What possible detriment could have been experienced or what disadvantage could we have suffered by reason of an open, public discussion of that matter? It is sheer fancy to dwell upon dangers thus conjured up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In reply, I will say to the Senator that that was a very delicate and difficult transaction. Previous treaties of a similar character had been defeated by the machinations and influence of the German Government on a number of occasions, and public opinion in Denmark was widely divided on that very subject. It was a difficult treaty to negotiate and a difficult treaty to induce Denmark to ratify.

Mr. BORAH. How did public opinion get into operation on that question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, it got into operation because, as a rule—and I have called the Senator's attention to this fact before—that the treaties of the United States have been openly undertaken, the actual negotiations have not been carried on in public, in a public hall, but there have been no secrets in American diplomacy. We have, as a rule, openly undertaken the treaties which we have finally adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that while we get information of a treaty, the first steps toward it are secret. The first real information which this country got as to the proposed terms of the treaty came across the water from Denmark, because Denmark dealt with it openly. Germany had all the information which she could possibly have had the negotiations been in the most open and notorious way. The treaty was discussed in the Danish Parliament; and, if I recall, a plebiscite was had; it was discussed in the European press; it was revealed in the Old World; we got our information of it fairly early because that kind of a transaction was not of transcendent moment to us.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I simply wish to suggest along that line, that that treaty was dicussed in both houses of the Danish Parliament, and was the subject of a referendum or an election.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no doubt of that fact; but would the Senator like to have treaties to which the United States is a party submitted to a referendum in the United States and thrown into political campaigns? Would he like to bring about a condition such as they had in Denmark?

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think he would stand among very few people in the United States if he would. We have enough troubles in politics now without injecting treaties into it.

Mr. FALL. The Senator asked me a question. I simply rose to suggest a historical fact to the Senator from Idaho. I have expressed myself upon the proposition. I should like to have had the people of the United States equally as well informed as the people of Denmark when Denmark made the treaty with the United States.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the treaty with Denmark, which had been negotiated during President McKinley's administration, under the Danish law went to both houses of their parliament. It was passed through the lower house but was lost in their senate by one or two votes, owing to German intrigue. That was in 1899, or thereabouts, as I recall, during President McKinley's administration. All Danish treaties go before both houses of the Danish Parliament.

Mr. BORAH. I must confess, Mr. President, that I have been somewhat taken by surprise to find that there could be two constructions of the President's language. We will likely hear from the President upon this matter later. I venture to hope that the President intended to declare himself against secret diplomacy, and that his future declarations will construe this message in perfect harmony with the view which those of us who are supporting the amendment put upon it.

Now, Mr. President, let us assume, for the sake of the argument, for a few moments that the President was not speaking with reference to the United States or seeking to commit it to a more open policy than that which it has heretofore pursued, and that he was addressing himself particularly to the secret diplomacy of Europe. Of course, if he was doing that, he was simply throwing the moral influence of the United States against the system in Europe. Everyone who has undertaken to keep in touch with the literature of the European countries since that time knows that the declaration of the President has had a very powerful influence in European circles. It is understood that the people of the United States, speaking through their President, are in favor of open diplomacy and against the system which has heretofore prevailed in Europe. That has given encouragement to the discussion of the matter not only among the leaders of Europe and in the press of Europe, but among the masses of the people of Europe. It has gone down to those who ordinarily have very little to do with diplomatic or foreign affairs; and practically all the associations—not only labor associations but civic organizations and organizations which have for their purpose the carrying forward of these propaganda—have taken it up in their meetings and have almost universally indorsed it. I known of no instance to the contrary. So it has led to a universal discussion and, so far as the masses of the people are concerned, almost a universal indorsement.

The Senators will observe, in reading the foreign dispatches, and especially resolutions passed by the different organizations in Europe, constant references are being made to President Wilson's policy of open diplomacy and his advancement of the cause. Now, let us assume for the sake of the argument, as I say, that the President was simply seeking to build up and strengthen the propaganda against secret diplomacy. What shall the Senate of the United States do in regard to that same matter? What shall be its attitude upon this matter? Will it say to the people of Europe, contrary to the voice of the President, "We do not believe in open diplomacy. We are not only opposed to the negotiations being in the open, but we are opposed to the discussion of the treaty being in the open, when the time comes to make it final and binding upon the mass of the people?"

If this discussion was begun for the purpose of breaking down the system in Europe—and I believe it was done for that purpose, in part—what do the Senators think would be the effect of our taking a position contrary to the position which has been announced by the President? Would it not greatly disparage the whole movement? Would it not be unfortunate to the Senate of a free people to take its stand along with the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator asks me that question I will say that my impression has been that all Europe recognized the United States as having an ideal system and that it was an effort of the President of the United States to secure from Europe the adoption of the same system.

I want to say to the Senator that I have not taken the position that the Senate should never consider a treaty in open session. I simply take the position that at the time a treaty is up for consideration the Senate should decide by a majority vote whether it shall be considered in open session or in secret session; and I am willing to trust the judgment of the Senate at that time to decide wisely. I have on a number of occasions voted for the consideration of treaties in open session, but I do not want to have the Senate bound and shackled by a rule that it has to consider them in open session unless it can get the permission of all but 30 Senators, who, under the proposed rule, will enjoy the right of tying up sixty-odd Senators.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in furtherance of the suggestion which I have made as to the growth of this policy in European countries, and as to the way in which it has been understood, I call attention to another article by Mr. Dickinson. It is true that this article was written before the announcement of the President's policy on the 8th of January, but it is in construction of the same proposition as to what is the meaning of "open diplomacy," and what the people of Europe understand by it. It shows that the President, in using the term, did not use it without precedents, but was using it as it had been used by different writers at different times during the last four or five years.

Mr. Dickinson says:

> It is a diplomats' war. None of the peoples wanted it, and none of them would have stood for it, if in some way they could have been jointly consulted in the light of full knowledge of the fact. But they were not consulted, either jointly or severally, no more in the countries called democratic than in the autocracies. If they had been, there would have been no war. Hence the movement for the democratic control of foreign policy.

"Hence," says Mr. Dickinson, "the movement for the democratic control of foreign policy." What do they understand by "democratic control"? What did the President understand when he spoke of open diplomacy, of democratic control? Did he mean a few secret powers? Does democratic control mean control by chancelleries? Does the "public view" mean closed doors? This whole movement for open diplomacy is associated with the idea of democratic diplomacy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GUION in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the following passage in the President's message, which perhaps he has overlooked:

> The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been audience, as was desired.

Mr. BORAH. "A Daniel come to judgment!" Now, I want to call the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] back on the witness stand. Let us see if the President of the United States was unfamiliar with the English language:

> Parleys have been in progress at Brest-Litovsk between Russian representatives and representatives of the central powers to which the attention of all the belligerents has been invited for the purpose of ascertaining whether it may be possible to extend these parleys into a general conference with regard to terms of peace and settlement. The Russian representatives presented not only a perfectly definite statement of the principles upon which they would be willing to conclude peace but also an equally definite program of the concrete application of those principles. The representatives of the central powers, on their part, presented an outline of settlement which, if much less definite, seemed susceptible of liberal interpretation until their specific program of practical terms was added. That program proposed no concessions at all either to the sovereignity of Russia or to the preferences of the populations with whose fortunes it dealt, but meant, in a word, that the central empires were to keep every foot of territory their armed forces had occupied—every Province, every city, every point of vantage—as a permanent addition to their territories and their power. It is a reasonable conjecture that the general principles of settlement which they at first suggested originated with the more liberal statesmen of Germany and Austria, the men who have begun to feel the force of their own peoples' thought and purpose, while the concrete terms of actual settlement came from the military leaders who have no thought but to keep what they have got. The negotiations have been broken off. The Russian representatives were sincere and in earnest. They can not entertain such proposals of conquest and domination.
> The whole incident is full of significance. It is also full of perplexity. With whom are the Russian representatives dealing? For whom are the representatives of the central empires speaking? Are they speaking for the majorities of their respective parliaments or for the minority parties, that military and imperialistic minority which has so far dominated their whole policy and controlled the affairs of Turkey and of the Balkan States which have felt obliged to become their associates in this war? The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed doors, and all the world—

Now, here you have your "town lot," of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] spoke, you have your public hall, of which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] spoke, and all the nations of the earth eagerly looking on—> and all the world has been audience, as was desired.

To whom have we been listening, then?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. REED. In view of the eventuation of that little conference between gentlemen who wanted to do everything in the open on one side and gentlemen on the other side who were too smart to do it in the open, does the Senator now think that we ought to follow the example of our bolsheviki friends?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would follow the example of my bolsheviki friends in this particular matter up to the point of accepting German gold. If Trotzsky and Lenine had been the true friends of the Russian people; if they had been representing the Russian people as they professed to be representing the Russian people, the open diplomacy would have been altogether to their advantage and to their aid, for the reason that any proposition which they might have made in open session in good faith would have had the moral backing of the entire world. But you can not test the question of open diplomacy or its worth by a transaction in which men are acting under duress or secret corruption. But while that conference was in some sense a failure the only redeeming feature is that all the world knows precisely what was done and can act accordingly.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator's argument, then, brings us to this: Notwithstanding all of the beauties and glories and safeguards of open diplomacy, still a nation can be sold in the broad daylight and in the open market, and open diplomacy affords no protection against that.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. If that is the case——

Mr. BORAH. But that is not the case.

Mr. REED. But that is what the Senator says took place.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. The open diplomacy in Russia was distinctly to our advantage. We knew precisely what was done, and it was greatly to our advantage and the allies to know. And the fact that it was in the open also enabled the Russian people to pass judgment upon the matter and has had more effect in breaking down Lenine and Trotzsky in the estimation of the Russian people than any other single fact. The Russian people, being familiar with the transactions, were able to pass judgment upon them, and they are passing judgment upon them, and when Lenine and Trotzsky are finally disposed of unconcealed transactions at Brest-Litovsk will have had much to do with it. But had it been in secret the Russian people would have been at the mercy of any statement of facts which those who betrayed them would have seen fit to make. I venture to say if the conference were to be held again it would be in secret.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, the Russian people gained nothing from the open diplomacy. When the diplomatic conference dissolved, Russia was content and laid down her arms, and Russia never woke up until she was aroused by the rattle of Prussian sabers. So that if these people were sold out by their representatives in these open negotiations it would appear to argue that open negotiations are no protection against the grossest form of betrayal that man is capable of perpetrating.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the Senator is correct in his statement that open diplomacy is not a panacea for all the evils connected with this matter, but, in my judgment, the Senator would no more contend that open transactions upon the part of a burglar were more desirable than secrecy than he would contend, that secret diplomacy was not an aid to crime if a person wanted to commit a wrong. Publicity does not always prevent unwise legislation here or even venal legislation, but it is nevertheless a great help to wise and responsive legislation.

Mr. REED. No; but, to come back to the question—the illustration is all right, but it really has not any application—the Senator is arguing in favor of this open diplomacy because the President has pronounced an encomium upon the demand of the bolsheviki representatives for open procedure. Now, unfortunately, the result of that one example was absolutely to demonstrate that that method afforded no protection whatever, and that if you are going to protect a nation you must look for something beyond mere publicity; and if you look for something beyond mere publicity you will have to come to the question of honest, patriotic representatives of the people; and if you have honest, patriotic representatives of the people, they will not betray that people even though the doors of the Senate happen to be locked.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Does the Senator contend that if parties desired to make a sinister agreement, or an improper agreement, they would just as soon make it in the open as in secret?

Mr. REED. No; I contend this: I undertake to say that if two nations desire to make a corrupt agreement, they will make it, regardless of any rule that the Senate may adopt. But this is what I am arguing to the Senator; this is the question I want considered, and it is the one I argued: Admitting that in an ideal world all diplomatic negotiations ought to be conducted in the open and that all nations ought to agree to conduct them in the open, that that is the best and the most proper way in which to carry them on, what about the proposition of one nation agreeing to do that with itself and exposing all of its negotiations, while all the rest of the world retains the advantage over it of secret negotiations? Now, that is the real question.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I was discussing that question while the Senator was absent.

Mr. REED. I was absolutely called out.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that.

Mr. FALL and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico. I will come back to this matter, however, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me.

Mr. FALL. Just to keep the record straight with reference to what took place in Russia, I think we should understand the circumstances exactly. Lenine and Trotzsky negotiated this treaty, which under their own form of government should have been referred to the people's council, and under the form of government which they had already established it never could have been a legal treaty until passed upon and approved by the people's council; but Lenine and Trotzsky by force of arms, by calling on their red soldiers, dissolved the people's council and made the treaty themselves. It was never referred to the people's council, and its only reference was to the Soviet, which they had established themselves in the place of the legal body which should have passed upon it.

Mr. REED. All of which only goes to show that this high authority which has been cited as being the leader in the great world reform for open diplomacy is a very bad and wicked and questionable and crooked policy, and that the proponents of this measure would better have left the Bolsheviki out of the argument.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; in just a moment. I presume when the Senator made that reference he had reference to the Russian advocates of open diplomacy, and not to the President of the United States.

Mr. REED. I am talking about the Bolsheviki; and I say this: I think you will not find that the President of the United States has anywhere advocated that this Government shall at this time open its books and open its business to the world, with all the rest of the world acting in secret, any more than the President—although he is an advocate of peace, and undoubtedly would like to see world-wide disarmament—is advocating the disbandment of our Army and our Navy; and I am sure he will not advocate it until other nations shall agree to a similar policy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to get the Senator's interpretation of this language of the President:

> The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been audience, as was desired.

That was certainly an indorsement upon the part of the President of that particular transaction. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. The Senator asks me to interpret it. I have not any doubt that the President of the United States wanted to encourage the Russians at least to deal in the open, so that we might know what was going on, and that he said those pleasant words hoping that they would be sent across the sea and might do some good; but that is very far from committing us to a policy of that sort.

The President found this sort of condition: Russia was breaking all of her promises to her allies. Her armies were dissolving into men. She was about to be absorbed by the Prussian power, or overrun by the Prussian power; and I suppose whatever encouragement he could give he gave them by saying that they were doing this in the open. But will the Senator find me a statement from the President asking us to commit this country to the policy of open-door diplomacy until and unless it is accomplished by agreement with other powers, so that all shall in like manner and at the same time expose their methods of doing business?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri find the Senator from Idaho any limitation whatever upon the President's language with reference to open diplomacy from this time on?

Mr. REED. No; and I find nothing committing himself to that policy. This policy that the President has laid down here is a program of world peace—something that is to come in the future. He is dealing with the future. He is speaking about what ought to be arrived at as the fundamental conditions of peace; and what are they?

> (1) Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

Why, that is an express statement that the policy you are now advocating as applicable to the United States is to be world-wide, and if you make it world-wide I have no criticism; and so I ask, why not amend your proposition and say that this shall not be of force or effect until all the principal nations of the world shall likewise agree?

Now let me read on. The second proposition made by the President in this tabulation is—> Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas.

Would we grant free navigation upon the seas to-day to German boats? They are entirely too free at the present time, and we are trying to sink them; but when the war is over and peace has come we will probably be willing to grant free navigation even to the Prussians, if there are any of them left. I hope to God there will not be many.

> III. The removal, as far as possible, of all economic barriers.

That is a doctrine to which we are not committing ourselves to-day, and will not until, at the same moment that we take down our barriers, other nations shall take down theirs.

> IV. Adequate guarantees given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety.

That is an adequate guaranty which he is asking. He is not proposing to dissolve our armaments until other nations shall dissolve theirs.

And so all the rest of the program lies in futuro.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; and all actions under this amendment would have to be in the future.

Mr. President, more interesting than the subject of open diplomacy is what the President means by what he says—and I do not want the Senator from Missouri to leave the Chamber until I collect together some two or three statements and see, when they are taken collectively, just what they mean.

I begin again with the statement which I have just read:

The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been audience, as was desired.

That was a transaction which was taking place before the war closed; that was a transaction which was going on in the midst of the war; and although it was going on in the midst of the war the President approved of it and indorsed it. He did not say that it would have been better if the Russian people had waited, that it was unfortunate for them to undertake to deal with the German people in the midst of the war, but he indorses a transaction which is there taking place in the open during the war.

Mr. REED. A transaction in which our enemy is one party and an erstwhile friend who is abandoning us in the midst of the fight is another party; and why should we not want them to put their cards on the table? The more we can find out the better.

Mr. BORAH. But certainly no one would be so fatuous as to expect open diplomacy for all our enemies and secret diplomacy for all our friends.

Mr. REED. Certainly. The virtue is that we find out; but I do not want the other man to have the virtue of finding out what we are doing until I know what he is doing. I should like to have the Senator discuss that question.

Mr. BORAH. I will come to that; but here is a transaction which is of concern to all the world. It was of concern to us and it was of concern to all the world. It was a diplomatic transaction. It was in the midst of war. It was a thing which happened at the time the President was speaking, and he indorses it. True, it would give us some advantage; but he was dealing with one whom the President regarded at that time as our ally, and that which was to the advantage of the ally would be to our advantage, and that which was to the disadvantage of Russia would be to our disadvantage; and yet the President approves of the transaction. Then, after he gets through with the transaction which was then in progress, he deals with the other proposition, on page 5. He says:

Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. He puts no limit upon the proposition that all nations shall come into the transaction or that all nations shall agree to it, but commits the United States to the policy, and it has been so interpreted throughout all Europe. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. May I suggest to the Senator from Idaho a way in which he can ascertain what the President means, before any harm is done to anyone? These treaties must be negotiated by the President in the first instance, before the Senate has anything to do with them whatever. If the President pursues the policy which the Senator from Idaho thinks he must under the language which he uses; if he publishes all the correspondence to the world at the close of this war, with all the conversations and all the private correspondence printed and published, there would be no need of an executive session. The world would know all about it.

If the President negotiates treaties as it has been done for a century or more in this country and does not publish to the world everything, those Members of the Senate who wish to follow the example set by the President would govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has a keen sense of humor. The suggestion of the Senator implies that the President is wholly insincere in the statement he made.

Mr. McLEAN. I am suggesting to the Senator a way by which he can ascertain just what the President means before the Senate acts.

Mr. BORAH. I have no difficulty whatever, and I do not think the Senator has any difficulty, in understanding what the President means. The Senator will not contend that the President did not indorse open diplomacy from beginning to end.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator can see——

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Connecticut entertain a different view?

Mr. McLEAN. I would not undertake to express a view.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator any opinion on the subject?

Mr. McLEAN. I am perfectly willing to remain on the safe side and let the President by his conduct show just what he means.

Mr. BORAH. Has the Senator any doubt about what he means?

Mr. McLEAN. I have great doubt that he means what the Senator from Idaho thinks he means.

Mr. BORAH. What does the Senator from Connecticut think the President meant when he said that diplomacy should proceed "always frankly and in the public view"? What does the Senator think the President means by that?

Mr. McLEAN. He means to follow the policy followed by the Chief Executives of this country since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend secret negotiations——

Mr. McLEAN. To make the best bargain he can for the United States of America and submit that bargain to the American Senate, where it will be debated, amended, ratified, or rejected.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that the President's diplomacy meant nothing at all with reference to a change in the policy of this country?

Mr. McLEAN. He was speaking for the future.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that he was speaking in the future of a changed policy?

Mr. McLEAN. I can not say, for I do not know what he intends to do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator can interpret language. What does the Senator think the President meant by the language he used? Just simply take the language he employed when he declared for open diplomacy, when he says that "diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view."

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know just what he means, and I suggest to the Senator that the safe thing for this body to do is to wait, as we can wait safely, and then we shall make no mistake.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says he does not know and of course that ends it.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Assuming that the Chief Executive wholly believes in the principle enunciated in the address which is so frequently quoted from, and assuming that he is in favor of a revision of the rules of the Senate, would there have been any inconsistency in the President recommending at the same time a change of the Senate practice to conform to open diplomacy?

Mr. BORAH. No; but I do not know that the President has authorized any change or suggested any change in the rules of the Senate. I have heard it hinted here that the President is in favor of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I have no knowledge that that is a fact. I have no information which leads me to believe that the President is interfering in this matter in any way, shape, or form. I know that the Senator from Alabama has been an advocate of this proposition ever since he came into the Senate, and my opinion is that the Senator from Alabama was the originator of the amendment, and that it did not have its initiative and inception with the President of the United States. That is my opinion. I think that if the President had been delivering a message on the subject it would have been pertinent to inquire why he did not cover this subject, but I doubt very much if the Senator from Ohio has any information upon which he would want to rely to the effect that the President is in favor of the Underwood amendment.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator makes a rather embarrassing statement when he states that he doubts if I have information on which I would be willing to rely.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator a question which he may have answered when I was not on the floor, but I will ask it de novo. Has the Senator any knowledge as to whether, when the President employs the term "open diplomacy," he considers the ratification of a treaty by the Senate to be a part of open diplomacy?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know what the President thought about that, but I know as far as we are concerned we can not construe it in any other way, because it is a part of the diplomatic process by which the fruits of diplomacy are gathered. As the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said yesterday, we are really a part of the negotiating power. We are a part of the diplomatic machinery of the Government, and therefore it must necessarily follow that when the President spoke of open diplomacy, whether he had it in his mind or not, his language would cover our transactions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I may be mistaken about it, of course, but I do not consider the legislative act of the Senate in ratifying a treaty to be a part of diplomacy. There is no dictionary to which I have access, and I have looked at three of them, which does not define diplomacy substantially to be the art of conducting negotiations between nations through their ambassadors and ministers appointed for that purpose. I do not understand and I do not believe that diplomacy refers at all to the ratification of a treaty, but it does refer to the preliminaries and negotiations held by diplomatic officials in formulating the terms of a protocol.

Mr. BORAH. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the Senator from Connecticut is correct, he would admit that the President has committed himself to open negotiations up to the point where it reaches the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should judge so, Mr. President; that is, whether he has committed himself or not, he has used language that would lead me to think that he favored open diplomacy without at all saying that he was not conducting it in the open now. From such extracts as I have heard read from his message it would seem that he was more particularly talking about the open diplomacy of European and Asiatic powers, and not intimating that our diplomatic methods have not been open, frank, and aboveboard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. Does the Senator claim that we have open diplomacy in this country?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know, Mr. President. I never have heard any criticism upon our diplomacy as being secretive or underhanded or dishonest, and my impression is, though I am no mind reader and no prophet, certainly not the official interpreter of the words or policy of the administration, what the President had in mind was to urge the European powers to reform their methods of conducting their diplomatic affairs. As the Senator has so well said, the people abroad did not know what their treaties were. They were negotiated in secret and they were held in secret. The people of this country knew what our treaties were. They were all made public.

They are in bound volumes of the RECORD. They are accessible in every library in the country. Whatever other nations may have been in the dark as to what compacts had been made which they were asked and bound to give their allegiance to, without knowing what was in them until told by their privy councils, we certainly were in no doubt as to what our international treaties were and our international obligations.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is now confusing in his mind a treaty and diplomacy which a moment ago he desired to separate. Is there any difference between the method of carrying on diplomacy in this country and in Europe, so far as diplomatic arrangements are concerned?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that there is.

Mr. BORAH. Then if the powers have had secret diplomacy they have not had the secret diplomacy which the President understands to be secret diplomacy in this country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would seem to be so; yet I do not believe that the President means that our diplomatic authorities, those responsible for our diplomatic affairs, have done things in a way that ought to be condemned as those of the European and Asiatic powers. I think he has a different opinion of our diplomatic past and present from that, and I certainly have. But all I meant to say when I rose, and I hope the Senator will excuse me, for I did not desire to interrupt him, was that to my mind there is a great distinction between open diplomacy and the proceedings of the Senate upon the result of the diplomatic efforts of the various ambassadors of the world.

Mr. BORAH. I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I think there is light thrown on the President's purpose by the words I am about to read, and I call attention to language that has not been called to the attention of the Senate. I think they make it perfectly plain to what the President, in speaking about open negotiations, was referring, a time when the great powers of the earth sitting around in the council chamber to make peace would be called upon to act. In that case he insists upon open diplomacy; and, second, in referring to secret diplomacy he refers to something more than the Senate acting behind closed doors, to certain very secret arrangements that have been made between European powers and which have been the cause of trouble. Let me read this language, because I think it will clear up the President's message. I am reading from the bottom of page 4 of this print:

> It will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open, and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind. The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interest of particular governments and likely at some unlooked-for moment to upset the peace of the world. It is this happy fact, now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not still linger in an age that is dead and gone, which makes it possible for every nation whose purposes are consistent with justice and the peace of the world to avow now or at any other time the objects it has in view.

Then the President proceeds to catalogue what he declares are the proper objects and purposes of this war.

Mr. BORAH. I will say to the Senator from Missouri I read that statement a few moments ago as an explanation of the President's position.

Mr. REED. I did not catch it.

Mr. BORAH. The President in his address February 11, 1918, refers to the question of open diplomacy with reference to the overtures made by Count Czernin. He says:

> He is jealous of international action and of international counsel. He accepts, he says, the principle of public diplomacy, but he appears to insist that it be confined—> at any rate in this case, to generalities and that the several particular questions of territory and sovereignty, the several questions upon whose settlement must depend the acceptance of peace by the 23 States now engaged in the war, must be discussed and settled, not in general council, but severally by the nations most immediately concerned by interest or neighborhood.

As some of our friends do here—

In other words, the President objects to his interpretation of open diplomacy because it does not go into details and deal with details as he thinks open diplomacy should.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the President objected to Count Czernin's answer to the proposition for the terms of peace because Count Czernin said that the terms of peace that Germany made with Italy were matters alone for conference between Germany and Italy and the business of no other country. It was not upon the question of open or secret treaties, but of Germany's attitude in claiming the right to make a peace with each country according to her own terms and not to have any general council of peace.

Mr. BORAH. That is one of the objections after the President puts his disapproval upon the count's view to accept "public diplomacy," because he confines it "to generalities" and refuses to permit it to go to details. That is cited for the purpose of showing that the President is not only in favor of open diplomacy with reference to the general proposition but he is in favor of open diplomacy with reference to all the details which lead up to the final settlement between nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I understand open diplomacy to mean.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. LEWIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina first.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely wish to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, the evil he seeks to correct by this proposed amendment to the rules would not be largely obviated if the nations of earth would follow the custom of the United States, when diplomacy had completed its work and the treaty was ratified to publish it to all its people and to all the world?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think so at all, and I will tell the Senator why, and I think the Senator, if he will reflect upon it a minute, will see why. After the treaty is made and concluded, then the people of the different nations of the earth are bound by it. Now, what is the virtue to be obtained, what benefit or advantage to the people of the United States to know of a transaction that was completed and closed, and they are estopped from raising any question about it except by the election of a new Congress.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The reason why I asked the question was because of the language which we find here, which points to these secret treaties. The negotiations lead up to the perfection of the understanding between the two contracting parties, and that is held in secret; and the President said at some unlooked-for moment some understanding in secret of which the other nations are not apprised is sprung up and brings about trouble.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does not want to confine the President's denunciation to the final result, because he says:

> Open covenants of peace openly arrived at.

That is the language of the President. What does the Senator interpret the President to mean by saying "openly arrived at"?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Understand, I am not attempting to square the action of the Senate with what the President had to say here. What I am interested in is whether or not the methods that we have been pursuing are safe or unsafe. If the American processes are safe, why depart from them? It certainly has not caused any great disturbance in the world's affairs, for we have negotiated our treaties and published them so that the people of the United States could read them.

But it has not been so in Europe. They have negotiated treaties for the particular advantage of some one nation and kept them secret until the time was ripe to put them in operation and spring them as a surprise on the world.

Mr. BORAH. That is not the position which the Senator advocated a few moments ago, which was that the President was advocating simply open publication of treaties.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think he had in his mind that particular phase.

Mr. BORAH. The President can express himself quite as lucidly as anyone in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It may be that I was unfortunate in my method of expression; but that was one of the reasons, perhaps the paramount reason.

Mr. BORAH. What does the Senator think the President means when he says "openly arrived at"?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think he meant just what he said. I call the Senator's attention to the paragraph where he said that we stand out in the open field——

Mr. BORAH. I am glad the Senator is candid.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was trying to state that the matter now before us is, Shall we adopt your resolution when the American processes have been satisfactory?

Mr. BORAH. American processes have not been satisfactory, or the President would not have declared against them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There may be a difference of opinion on that point.

Mr. BORAH. There are differences of opinion on the other side of the Chamber up to a certain time. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to test the meaning of his position? The Senator from Idaho, if I understand him accurately, will have the proceedings touching a treaty made public before the treaty has been agreed upon?

Mr. BORAH. That is the position of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. LEWIS. On the theory that the public should know what the matters were before conclusion by the public representatives has been reached?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. That is the position of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, we will take the propositions suggested by the foreign governments, which are not arrived at, which may not be accepted by the Senate, which may not be agreed to by the Senate, which may not find their way in the treaty. Will the Senator also urge that those propositions should be made public and held up before the public and the people, without regard to the effect such may have on those involved, notwithstanding the fact that they may never be accepted?

I will take a concrete case we have known from public expression that which I think I can illustrate what I mean by this comparison: It is publicly stated that there is an effort being made to have the United States enter into some understanding by which the troops of our own Government or the troops of the Governments of our military allies can enter Siberia. Let me illustrate. Suppose to-morrow morning a proposition were really made by Japan to the United States concerning the entry into Siberia, and let me assume to the able Senator that at the same time a proposition of similar import will be made by Great Britain, one of the allies of Japan. It may have been a thing that we could not accept—one we could not cooperate with. Does my able friend from Idaho urge that those propositions should be made public, producing all the effect it might upon the public mind as well as information to the enemy of the object of the propositions themselves, without regard to whether we should accept or whether we did accept them, and which we might reject?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, a mere suggestion of that nature which might not result in any obligation upon the part of the Government, it might not be important enough to make public, but I can not see any possible objection to making it public. Suppose it was not accepted, what possible disadvantage can flow from the fact that it was not accepted?

Suppose, we will say, that they finally ripen into acceptance; then the Senator from Idaho contends that they should be made public from the beginning, because it puts a binding obligation upon the people. In other words, the President may enter into an obligation, an alliance, with some nation to send troops to Siberia, ought not the people who are going to be sent as soldiers to be informed as the matter proceeds to a binding obligation? Is it not fair and just that they shall know for what they are called upon to fight and to die?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator by this suggestion now that we are at war: Would not the Senator's proposition be tantamount to letting the enemy know the propositions of the allies with the United States, the intention, the object, and the movements, notwithstanding the same might not be accepted; and even if it were accepted, would not the proposition of the Senator mean that all the world must be informed and the information given to the enemy before we acted upon it and would allow steps to intercept the success of the propositions?

Mr. BORAH. There has never been a movement on the part of the United States in this war that the enemy were not thoroughly informed of it generally long before the American public. We could not send any Japanese troops to Siberia, we could not make any move there as the result of that suggestion, without the enemy knowing it. On the other hand, suppose we make it a suggestion to send troops to Siberia and they are not sent, and the enemy know that, what advantage is it to the enemy?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator has reversed the proposition. Supposing the proposition were made by Japan to us or made by Japan's ally, Britain, to us and carried with it such a movement, which, if modified, might be acceptable to us, would not that betray to the enemy the deal before we had accepted it and before we had anything to do with the subject and possibly serve to defeat its purpose or success? Would we not also awaken in the public mind a form of resentment or insistence upon a matter which we had not ourselves accepted and which we had not up to that point wholly investigated? Would we not embarrass the situation by betraying to the public the mere proposition for their acceptance?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may be permitted, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Illinois the supposition that he submits is not at all one of a diplomatic nature. We are to all intents and purposes allies—France, Great Britain, Japan, and the United States. The fact that one commander in chief of an army of one of these nations cooperates with another and desires to advise with it about the cooperation of those armies presents no diplomatic feature at all and is neither a case of open or secret diplomacy. It is a question of the movement of troops in the field in time of war by allies and has nothing to do with diplomacy.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, the Senator from Connecticut assumes a state of circumstances where troops could be sent without regard to any consideration of contract or exchange of papers. Let me offer to the Senator from Connecticut a suggestion. The public press some time ago informed us that Japan was sending certain ships to the service of one country in turn of that country yielding steel and the privileges of steel to Japan. That must have resulted from some compact, some form of arrangement. Let me suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that if Japan instead of sending troops as a mere fighting agent into Siberia assumed to render aid in consideration for the United States doing this or that, surely the Senator would recognize that that would take the form of some compact, and as such would have first to be stated in terms before it could be accepted, would the Senator from Connecticut intimate that that should first be made public?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all, Mr. President. I do not think any war movement or orders or plans should be made public. I merely wish to say that that has nothing to do with diplomacy, either open or secret. If the war council of the allies decide that it would be of advantage to our cause to have Japan enter Siberia, but did not want to do it until they knew we would not object to it, and if they sent a cable to the President, the Commander in Chief of this country, to know whether he has any objection to it or not, and he says, "No; I have not," I do not consider that a treaty has been made or any diplomatic relation held between the two countries. It is simply the commander in chief of the forces of the different allied nations deciding upon a military policy which is neither the making of a treaty nor the making of diplomatic relations.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I answered the Senator's question when I began. I said I would not make such plans public.

Mr. LEWIS. What I wanted to urge upon the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Connecticut is this point: If any suggestions were made of freedom of citizenship to Japanese, freedom of immigration to Japanese or exchange of our products, say steel for example, would the Senator recognize that as being the form of a treaty and the part of diplomacy?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I would be in favor of making it public.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the Senator would have the negotiations made public whether accepted or rejected?

Mr. BORAH. Absolutely, if it was not a war movement; if it belonged to diplomacy; yes.

Mr. LEWIS. And have it exposed and likewise make public the negotiations, whether they were additions or whether they were suggestions?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President; I would have the transaction from the beginning to the end open.

Mr. LEWIS. The statements, whatever they were, to be open if they were rejected, equally as if they were accepted. If the Senator persists, would he not see that such publicity would militate against the object of all our foreign movements?

Mr. BORAH. As the Senator from Connecticut says, if it is a pure movement with reference to troops I would not regard it as a matter coming under anything I have been discussing with reference to diplomacy. But if it was for the purpose of bringing about a treaty relationship or an understanding with reference to citizenship, or anything of that kind, which would be binding upon the country, I would make it an open proposition from the beginning.

Mr. LEWIS. I catch the Senator's whole position, and I thank him for the courtesy of permitting me to interrupt him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to object to interruptions, but if I am permitted to proceed for 5 or 10 minutes' time I shall close my remarks.

Mr. President, we have wandered far afield. The subject to which I was referring when led to digress by reason of questions which have been presented was the subject upon which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] lays much stress, and that is, that we should not commit ourselves to open diplomacy until all other nations accept the same proposition. Well, Mr. President, it is presumed that when open diplomacy is brought about, it will be acceded to by all the leading nations of the earth. That was undoubtedly the object and purpose of the President in his enunciation of his principles, and that, of course, is to be desired.

Mr. President, how shall we effectuate that change? How shall we bring about that result? As I said when interrupted, this discussion is going on in every nation of Europe. Indeed, I think it is safe to say that it is a subject of universal discussion among the people of Europe where the people are permitted to engage in the discussion of these subjects at all; and the propaganda is aided or hindered very largely by the action of the United States. We are a powerful factor in the proposition, and our position in regard to it will be considered as of moment by all the people who are interested in the proposition.

Mr. President, the President has declared his position in regard to this matter. If I am in error with regard to his position, nevertheless my view is the view which has been put upon his declaration, to wit, that there should be an open discussion of all diplomatic relations and that all diplomacy should proceed frankly in the open. I will now read another paragraph from Mr. Dickinson, from whom I was reading when interrupted:

> The existing situation in democratic countries is, on the face of it, preposterous. On questions of domestic policy in such countries the people are constantly consulted. An insurance bill, a shop-hours bill, an education bill, a land bill, are canvassed eagerly and passionately in Parliament and the country. The whole press is set in motion, public meetings are held, deputations are arranged, ministries rise and fall. But where hundreds of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives are concerned, where the very existence of the country is at stake, where the decision to be taken involves not an extra tax or a tentative experiment in social legislation easily to be recalled or modified if it does not succeed, but the immediate summoning of the whole manhood of the country to kill and be killed in ways of unimaginable horror, when, in short, that very thing to the fostering and development of which every act of man private and public, is rightly and exclusively directed, when life itself is to be destroyed wholesale, that decision, the most terrible any nation can be called upon to take, is precipitated by the fiat of half a dozen men working in the dark, without discussion, without criticism, without a "by your leave" or "with your leave"; and those who are to sacrifice in pursuance of it everything which hitherto they have created and cherished have no other choice than to accept the decision and pay the intolerable price. Surely only a god should have such power over men! And we give it to an Emperor or a Secretary of State.

There is no doubt about what Mr. Dickinson understands by "open diplomacy." He means a discussion in public before those who are bound by it, before those who are to sacrifice in case the sacrifice comes, before those who are to pay the taxes and to meet the burdens; and that is precisely what the President said. He said in plain effect that those things which have to do with the life, with the existence of the Nation, should receive the same public consideration and the same public view as those things of less moment, dealing with tariffs and with social and domestic affairs of the country. It is not necessary that we shall follow the President, but there ought not to be any doubt as to what he said. He said precisely what these other men meant who have been discussing the subject for the last 8 or 10 years, that a treaty should have the same open, public consideration as all other questions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I did not understand from what the Senator from Idaho was reading. Will he be kind enough to inform me?

Mr. BORAH. I was reading from Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, the English author.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a moment ago the Senator from Idaho referred to the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], to the effect that, inasmuch as foreign nations had kept their matters of diplomacy secret, we ought to do the same thing. I thought when the Senator from Missouri made that statement it would be a proper suggestion to make that, if that be the proper doctrine, we ought to follow those nations even more closely than that and adopt their policy of keeping all their treaties absolutely secret, not only while they are making them but after they are made.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. I thank the Senator from Michigan for the suggestion. I will read a further paragraph from Mr. Dickinson:

> It seems to be thought by many that there is something about foreign policy peculiarly difficult to understand; that it is a thing of mysteries and special faculties; so that, although the methods of representative government may be trusted to conduct us safely through all the intricacies of our home affairs, though the people roughly and in the last resort are fit to decide about free trade and tariff reform, contributory or noncontributory insurance, the nearer or remoter effects of this or that method of taxation, and all the innumerable questions difficult even to experts that are raised by almost any of the legislative measures adopted year by year in progressive countries; yet the same people are specially and peculiarly unfit to judge about international relations.
> Take the case of Morocco. Essentially what was it? The French wanted to annex Morocco. The Germans were opposed to this, mainly because they were interested in the trade and resources of the country. The British were willing to consent to a French annexation so long as the strip of coast opposite Gibraltar did not fall into the hands of the French or of any strong power. Nothing can be simpler than all this. It is not an intellectual problem at all. It is a contention for power and influence. Compare it, for difficulty of an intellectual kind, with the question of the ultimate effects on employment, wages, and prices of a protective tariff. Yet it never occurs to anyone to withdraw this latter question from the ultimate control of the people. Take again the Balkan question. It is, of course, intricate. It requires for its solution knowledge of a number of facts about races, boundaries, and the like. But so far as questions of general policy are concerned—questions that alone could be laid before a parliament—the matter is simplicity itself. Is Austria to eat up those peoples? Is Russia to eat them up? Or are they to eat up one another? Or is such an arrangement to be promoted as will separate out the nationalities, so far as may be practicable, and permit them each to develop freely in their own way?

> It is true that upon foreign policy issues of life and death hang more immediately and perilously than upon domestic. It is true that parliaments and peoples can not be trusted to decide this infallibly right judgment. But that is true also of statesmen and diplomats. There is nothing special about foreign policy which makes democratic principles less applicable there than in other departments of national life. Broadly, almost every question of foreign policy is one of power, or of the prestige which is a guaranty of power. And it is precisely on these questions of power that the people ought to pronounce, since it is their blood that has to purchase or maintain the power. What bearing has this "power" on the good life of men, our own or that of others for whom we may be rightly responsible? There is the most general problem of foreign policy, put as it ought to be put. How the people would answer it I do not take upon myself to say. I think they would answer it not as the diplomats have done. But, in any case, it is for them to answer it. If it is for them to answer anything at all. I doubt whether anyone will deny this who at all accepts democracy.

> This does not imply the dispensing with training and knowledge. It implies the putting of that training and knowledge at the disposal of the nation for its instruction, and the acceptance of the verdict of the nation thus instructed. We, in England, require a Salisbury, a Lansdowne, a Grey. Americans require a Root or a Lansing. But in a democracy these men are required, not to direct a passive nation but to take it into their confidence and then leave to it the decision. Now it is clear that, in Europe at any rate, the people have no control over foreign policy, even in countries otherwise democratic. This war certainly was sprung upon the British Nation. True, after it had been so sprung the nation indorsed it. But it was in the years preceding that the control ought to have been exercised. How the control would have operated must be matter of conjecture. But it is clear that, from a democratic point of view, the nation ought to have known what policy was being pursued and what the risks were. It could then have decided whether it would pursue a policy that might land it at any moment in a European war (in which case, presumably, it would have made the requisite preparations), or whether it would alter the whole direction of its policy, by proceeding, for example, on the lines indicated by Sir Edward Grey in his often-quoted dispatch. Or if it should have become evident, in attempting that change, that Germany was bent upon war, it would have been all the better that the fact should be known and the requisite measures taken. The result of not taking the nation into the confidence of the Government was about as bad as anything could be—a policy drifting into war without making any adequate preparations for war.

In 1905, Mr. President, we had an illustration of the treaty-making power behind closed doors of a transaction being carried on in secret, to which I want to call attention very briefly, and then I shall close. I shall read from a book entitled "The Eclipse of Russia," by Dr. E. J. Dillon. In chapter 16 of this book he says:

> Of all the extravagant and, one might add, irrational acts of the weak-willed sovereign who at last gave the death-blow to the Tsarist State the secret treaty, consisting of four brief clauses, which he concluded with Kaiser Wilhelm at Bjorke in July, 1905, occupies a foremost place. Politically it was a deed of surrender to the only formidable rival of his Empire, a covenant which crowned the suicidal process he had already inaugurated when he ordered Witte to accept Germany's proposals for a commercial treaty.

Then in chapter 18 he says:

> Witte told me, as follows, the story of how he learned of the existence of the secret treaty and the means he devised for the purpose of invalidating it: "I did not know, neither did I suspect, that the two monarchs had been treaty making during my sojourn at Portsmouth. It is true that the Kaiser had made an allusion to something they had done, but he did not give me to understand that it was an alliance or any compact of international moment. The exact words he employed as they now come back to me were these: 'I have a pleasant surprise for you. We—I mean your Tsar and I—have taken measures to realize this ideal of ours. If you are again put in charge of the Government machine, are you prepared to lend us a helping hand toward making it a practical instrument of international politics?' 'Certainly I am,' I replied. 'Good, very good,' he answered, 'I am delighted.'"

Now, here is the treaty to which Count Witte referred, which they had made in secret:

> Their Imperial Majesties, the Emperor of all the Russias and the Emperor of Germany, with the object of maintaining peace in Europe, have agreed on the following points of a defensive alliance:
> 1. If any European State attacks one of the two empires the allied party will employ all its naval and military forces to assist its ally.
> 2. The high contracting parties undertake not to conclude a separate peace with any common adversary.
> 3. The present treaty will come into force at the moment when peace is concluded between Russia and Japan. A year's notice must be given to terminate it.
> 4. As soon as this treaty comes into force Russia will take the necessary steps to make France acquainted with it and will suggest to France that she should participate in it as an ally.

Commenting upon this treaty, Count Witte says:

> In the meanwhile I made inquiries as to what had gone before the actual drafting and signing of the document. I like to have a clear and complete picture of such historic events in my mind's eye. I talked to several persons who, I thought, might throw some light on the subject, and gradually I pieced their accounts together and reconstituted the scene. What I suspected was confirmed; that there had been a long correspondence by messengers and by telegraph between the two monarchs, and that their meeting had been settled in that way with the utmost secrecy. Nobody was told of it, not even I, who had seen and talked at considerable length with the Czar before my departure for America, and who ought to have been primed with information about such matters. He never breathed a word of what he was meditating.
> When the two monarchs met and decided to sign the treaty, the Kaiser desired to have it countersigned. The Czar, who wanted to crown his secret negotiations in a conspirative way, did not see the object of this caution and said so. But Wilhelm with his business instincts insisted—"for the sake of the form," he pleaded. Nicholas II was put out by this because he disliked confiding state affairs of this nature to anyone. He is possessed by a mania for secrecy. But he allowed himself to be overruled by his confederate.

Then he called up the admiral, and the admiral witnessed the treaty, as Kaiser Wilhelm insisted.

Mr. President, it is that manner and method of carrying on international business in Europe against which the whole world is now practically arrayed. No one here undertakes to defend, as of course no one will defend, that method of making a treaty at this time. That was a treaty between the ruling monarchs of two nations. They met in secret and "arrived at" a covenant by which they undertook to map out a course which might involve the lives of millions.

The question is whether we will as a Nation throw our entire moral influence against that system which prevails in Europe? It can not be said that the system which prevails in Europe is no longer of any concern to us, because the system which has prevailed and does prevail in Europe is the cause of our being in this conflict. If we are going to break down the system in Europe, we can only do so by declaring our fullest faith and our fullest confidence in open diplomacy; and that includes not only the negotiations but the action upon the part of the Senate in closing or ratifying treaties.

There may be some inconvenience, as I said the other day, and some minor evils flowing from open diplomacy; there may at times questions arise about which it would be better to have secrecy upon the part of the governments negotiating; open diplomacy is not entirely free from that criticism; but when you weigh the evils of secret diplomacy against the possible evils of open diplomacy, upon which side of the question will the United States take its stand? Will it fail to throw its influence against the system as a whole to break it down, if it is possible for it to be broken down in Europe, for the sake of preserving some of the minor benefits of secret diplomacy, or will it cast its entire influence against the system in order that it may disappear as a practice among the nations of the earth in any shape, form, or manner whatsoever?

I can conceive of nothing, Mr. President, more calculated to insure the permanent peace of the world than an open, candid discussion of the relationship between the nations of the earth; and I believe, as the President has said, that it is the prerequisite to permanent peace. I believe that we must take into consideration and into our confidence those upon whom the burden of war falls; that, if we are to have contentment among the people and satisfaction with the relationships between the different nations of the earth, the people must understand fully and completely the negotiations between them and the relationships as they exist. I do not think that the people will ever again be satisfied with any arrangement whatever of which they have not full knowledge, because they know that this war is a diplomatic war—a war which now involves practically the entire civilized world. Had it not been for secret machinations, which are covered and protected by this infamous system of secret diplomacy, it could and would have been avoided.

What possible evil arising from open diplomacy can be compared with the evil which we know flows from secret diplomacy? What possible disadvantage can arise to the people to be compared for a single moment with the crime with which we are now dealing? We can not for a moment hesitate to choose our position when we realize the tremendous disadvantage, whatever the minor advantages may be, of secret diplomacy.

So I say, Mr. President, in harmony with the declaration of the President for open diplomacy, that the Senate of the United States, as a part of the treaty-making power, where the fruits of diplomacy are gathered up and crystallized into a contract, should declare before the people of the world that we, too, are willing to risk our cause in the future with open negotiations.

The Senator from Missouri says wait until the other nations consent; but when will they consent if we do not hammer away at public opinion and arouse the masses of Europe and stir the people to assert their power and bring autocracy under control? If this great Republic is unwilling to take the lead, who will take the lead in this contest? Shall we wait until the Kaiser is satisfied? Shall we wait until the Hapsburgs are willing to give up their secret arrangements, or shall we ourselves take the lead in the effort to break down the system in so far as it is within our power to do so?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, we are considering a proposed change in the rules of the Senate, which heretofore, since the foundation of the Government, has had the right and privilege of discussing matters before it at such length as Senators thought would do justice to their views. It has been said, and truly said, in my opinion, that very little harm has ever come to the public by free and unlimited debate in the Senate, and I think all will agree that on many occasions many measures admittedly bad, as soon as time had been afforded for sober second thought, have been defeated.

The curious situation that we now confront is that to a resolution proposing a new rule designed to limit a Senator to a single speech of limited length upon any bill and also to 20 minutes upon any amendment that may hereafter be proposed to any bill, the Senator from Idaho is attempting to attach an amendment of world-wide scope relating to an entirely different matter, to wit, what he calls "open diplomacy" as against secret diplomacy.

If the proposed rule which we are now debating were in operation the Senator from Idaho, who has required, and justly and properly so, I think, in the aggregate, not less perhaps than four or five hours to present his views to the Senate upon his amendment, would have been limited to 20 minutes to explain how this world-wide change in the diplomatic affairs of the various nations of the world may be brought about. Can any Senator conscientiously claim that he thinks that the members of that portion of the treaty-making power of the United States represented by this body should be confined to 20 minutes apiece in the discussion of such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from Idaho? The Senator from Idaho could not have read the extracts from the three authorities quoted by him this afternoon in 20 minutes.

Nobody can tell what may come into the mind of any Senator in the way of proposing an amendment upon an utterly ungermane subject; nobody can tell how important an amendment may be. I will venture to say, that since the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] presented his resolution designed to limit debate in the Senate three-quarters of the time occupied in debate has been upon the proposed amendment of the Senator from Idaho, which has not yet been acted upon. If a practical illustration of the value of gagging the Senate were needed, I think that in the mere process of trying to apply the gag the trouble to be apprehended is perfectly apparent.

Mr. President, if I may be allowed to say so, I regard some of the references in the speech of the Senator from Idaho as misapplied, for I do not regard the proceedings of this body and a debate which may result in the ratification of a proposed treaty as a diplomatic matter. I do not think it presents either a case of open diplomacy or of secret diplomacy. It is a legislative act by a legislative body, and the processes result in a resolution of ratification. Whether the debate is conducted behind closed doors or with filled galleries and with newspaper reporters present does not change the nature of the act, and does not transfer it from the region of legislative business to that of executive diplomatic business.

I think the Senator from Idaho would admit, and I believe it is apparent to most Senators, that whatever damage has been done by the methods by which European and Asiatic powers have concluded treaties among themselves, the methods of the United States have been pretty fairly open and aboveboard. Our treaties are all made public; they are accessible in the public libraries to every citizen of this country who can read. Nobody in the land is deceived about our international obligations. Now, how will it conduce to "open diplomacy" in Europe or in Asia that the United States Senate, after a treaty has been concluded by the executive branch of the Government, shall debate it in open session instead of behind closed doors? Whether we shall pursue the course that we have pursued for 130 years, since the founding of this Government, and which many of the framers of the Constitution themselves instituted here when they sat in the Senate, or whether we shall adopt the procedure suggested by the Senator from Idaho, I think he exaggerates the effect that our action upon this amendment this afternoon, or whenever we shall vote upon it, will have upon foreign powers as to the methods they should employ in negotiating treaties with each other.

I do not say at all that the complaint made by certain gentlemen, speaking in the House of Commons, which was cited by the Senator from Idaho the other day, does not meet with my sympathy. It seems to me that it would be better if Great Britain should submit its treaties to the legislative branch of its Government and have them ratified instead of to its Privy Council; but I do not regard that as my business in particular or as coming within the jurisdiction of the Senate of the United States. I think that the less each nation attempts to meddle with the business of other sovereignties the more friends it will have in the world, and the more time it will have to look after its own business affairs.

Mr. President, some people say that if you pursue the methods that were pursued by the fathers in the ratification of treaties in this body, thereby you distrust the people. I do not think that conclusion is justly drawn from the premises. I do not think the Senate established the rule that treaties shou'd be considered behind closed doors, because they distrusted the people of this country, their own constituents. I think they did it because they thought it would do more damage than good to discuss the relations of foreign sovereignties to each other in the open and in the newspapers of this country; to have Senators of the United States stand here in the open, and members of the Foreign Relations Committee, with whatever knowledge they may be permitted to have with regard to our foreign relations, and talk about the alliances that European powers were liable to make with each other, and to attribute to this power and that power certain intentions, and to express their prejudices or their fears of this nation or that nation, and to drag all the laundry of Europe, with its rivalries and hostilities and jealousies, up and down, and parade it in the open here on the floor, the open forum of the United States Senate. I think that is the reason why they established the rule, that it would be much better if the Senators debated the matter of the ratification of the treaty among themselves, behind closed doors, and, if they ratified it, then it should be immediately made public. As has been said, if the treaty does not meet with popular approval there is a method provided for its denunciation and its repeal.

Mr. President, whatever anybody may think about the virtues of debating treaties here in open session, I am quite clear in my own mind, at least, that it would have absolutely no effect upon the processes employed by foreign sovereignties in negotiating among themselves. The Senator from Idaho talks about all the nations of the world coming together and having a free and frank talk about all these matters. Mr. President, in view of the hatreds that have been stirred up by this war, I do not think the nations of the world are going to come together and frankly and freely disclose to each other all their innermost ambitions and plans, even in the making of a treaty of peace; and if the permanence of a treaty of peace is to rest upon the assumption that they will do so, then I say you will not have any such permanence at all. Nations are very much like individuals, and they will all spar for their own advantage. They will not and can not lay all their cards upon the table in a public negotiation, and announce in advance what each one is going to try to get from the other in exchange for what it is willing to give.

So that I think the Senator from Idaho is—not to speak offensively at all—chasing a will-o'-the-wisp. I think he is looking forward to a state of affairs which would be almost like the millennium upon earth here, and he thinks the advent of that delectable period is to be hastened by some rule that the Senate may adopt here this afternoon. Although I have as high respect for the dignity and power of the Senate as almost any Senator, I think he exaggerates the effect that will attach to the adoption of this Senate rule along the lines that he hopes for.

Speaking about the dignity and power of the Senate, I agree in great measure with the sentiments expressed yesterday afternoon by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. We are very fond of talk here about attempted Executive encroachments. Perhaps there are such, and I think there have been attempts at such in the past, and I think they are happening at not long intervals in the present, too; but I think that is something that perhaps we can not prevent—the attempted invasion of legislative authority. But we can decline to be accessories to it, Mr. President, and I am in favor of preserving all the power that the Senate of the United States has. I think it will be needed in the future.

Mr. President, it grieves me to state that I think in large measure the Democratic Party, which has pretended to stand for liberty and free speech and personal liberty, and opposed to sumptuary legislation, is now engaged in an attempt to tear down all the historic precedents and beliefs of its own party. Instead of being opposed to sumptuary legislation, it not only is in favor of sumptuary legislation but it proposes to imbed it in the Constitution of the United States.

The New York World of June 7, 1918, has the following statement to make upon this subject. In an editorial entitled "Wiping out the States," it says:

> If any old-fashioned Democrats remain they must read with uneasiness the message sent by President Wilson to a member of the Louisiana Senate urging the legislature of that State to establish woman suffrage.
> This is a State measure with which the President has nothing to do, but it will be recalled that last January he recommended favorable action by Congress upon the proposed constitutional amendment, with which also in his official capacity he has nothing to do. Although the House of Representatives has given the amendment the necessary two-third majority, the supporters of the project in the Senate have not yet been sure enough of their ground to risk a vote in that body. The Louisiana telegram may have been intended in a roundabout way to influence the decision of the United States Senate or the representatives of that State in the Senate. If not, it must be accepted as a startling interference by the Chief Magistrate in a matter always held by Democrats to be within the sovereign powers of the States.
> In the process for amending the Federal Constitution no account is taken of the President. His approval is not necessary at any stage of the proceedings and he has no power of veto. Since the makers of the Constitution were extremely careful to leave national amendments wholly in the hands of Congress and the State legislatures, it must be admitted that presidential recommendations for or against State amendments are as questionable in point of taste as unwarranted in law.
> Surprise in this instance, however, results not so much from what has been done as from the fact that the innovation must be attributed to the most illustrious Democrat of our times. A prohibition amendment submitted by a democratic Congress and certain if adopted to make local self-government only a memory and cripple the police powers of the States is already before the various legislatures for approval. Woman suffrage by national amendment will deprive the States of control of the ballot, denied only once, in the case of the negro, and then disastrously. With a few more movements of this kind, State lines must disappear except as they may represent Provinces goaded and guided by an all-powerful centralism at Washington.
> The tremendous demands that war is making upon the hearts and minds of the people are likely to confuse judgment as to the momentous political revolutions now going on almost unnoticed, but it is not difficult to see what they mean to the people and what they mean to the Democratic Party. The changes in our form of government are to be radical and permanent. The party which for more than a century has resisted these changes, usually with success, now, under one of the greatest of its leaders, submits to them and, some will say, encourages them.
> Even though the historic Democratic Party may thus decree its own death, democracy is unconquerable. Under other names and other banners it will endure, but in the new alignment many a so-called Democrat who has lost faith in the basic principle of his party is bound to perish.

Mr. President, this editorial states that under other names and other banners the Democratic Party will endure. I think the writer is mistaken in that. It will endure under the same name, but the principles for which the Democratic Party formerly stood have been cast to the four winds of earth. They who prided themselves upon the right of their States to govern themselves and their home affairs in their own localities now rejoice to welcome the arm of the Federal Government into all their intimate affairs at home. They tear down carelessly the guaranties of the Constitution as to the rights of the States.

Mr. President, what has produced this tremendous change? It comes largely from the top. If the leader of the Democratic Party in this country were a real Democrat, you would not find the Democratic Members of this body voting for such legislation as they take pleasure in voting for at this session of Congress. The trouble is the bugle is playing the wrong tune; and while there will survive and there may be swept together the remnants of the historic Democratic Party after this war is over, and it may survive under the name of democracy, it will practice the preachments of the international socialists, Mr. President; and that is the desire of a large percentage of that party, without changing the name of the party, to replace the principles of Thomas Jefferson by the principles of Mr. Lenine and Mr. Trotzsky.

The Lord only knows whither they are drifting. Their anchors have dragged and they are dragging. They are tossing about in a sea of uncertainty. Their landmarks have disappeared; and all they hope is that by the parrot cry of "Stand by the President," right or wrong, irrespective of every other consideration, there will be enough survivors hanging on to the life preserver so that they can return to their seats next November. Meantime, what a price to have paid for what little political success they may achieve along those lines!

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, because the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is very anxious to place some matters in the RECORD before we adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, before the Senator does that——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I withhold the suggestion for a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to make a few observations on this matter, and I do not wish to have a quorum called for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I can do so, and still have the suggestion stand at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks, I withdraw it at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am entirely willing that a quorum shall be had before the Senator from Massachusetts proceeds.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho. In all he has said—and, as his custom is, said so well and forcefully—he has not once shown, nor can he or any man show, that it is possible under our form of government for us to practice what is known as secret diplomacy.

Applying "secret diplomacy, as that phrase was used by the President in his address, which the Senator from Idaho has taken as his text, it becomes nothing more nor less than a contradiction of terms. You had as well talk of a square circle or a level plain with hills on it.

Under present conditions the Senate can decide by majority vote whether a treaty shall be considered and decided in secret session or in open session. The Senator from Idaho insists, however, that unless two-thirds of the Senate vote to go into executive session, all treaties shall be considered and decided in open session. Why two-thirds instead of a majority of this membership should decide this question, the Senator in his long effort has not satisfactorily revealed? Is there not involved in this innovation on the rule of the majority a suggestion of egotism, in that two-thirds of this body has less sense and patriotism than the one-third who might oppose?

The Senate can decide whether open or secret consideration of a treaty should be had at the time the particular treaty appears before us for our action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I spoke yesterday on this matter I was very much pressed for time, as I was obliged to go to a conference. There were one or two matters which I desired to put into the RECORD in connection with what I said which I think will be of interest.

Through the kindness of Mr. Griffin, the Chief Assistant Librarian of the Library of Congress, my attention has been called to an article which appeared in a London magazine by Sir Frederick Pollock, a lawyer of very great distinction, both as a barrister and as a writer. It is a little statement about the Foreign Office and the House of Commons. I have found a good deal of confusion as to the precise attitude of the English Parliament toward a treaty, and as to the English method of dealing with treaties. I will not ask to have it read, and I will not take the time to read it; but I should be glad if permission could be given to have it printed with what I am now saying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, such will be the order.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE FOREIGN OFFICE AND THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In considering the relations between the foreign office and Parliament three points of view must be distinguished: That of strict legality, that of constitutional usage, and that of parliamentary practice not reducible to rule. Under the first head there is no difference between the foreign office and any other department of which a secretary of state is the chief. Under the second there is a difference, though here, as in all other matters of the same kind, exact definition is hardly attainable. Under the third there are peculiar features of some importance, depending not on the formal constitution of the department but on the nature of the business it has to do.

We have to bear in mind throughout that in our modern constitution there are two quite different kinds of executive power. First, there is the King's old undefined authority, so far as it has not been abrogated or limited by statutes or tacitly abandoned by long disuse; this, it is hardly needful to state, has long been exercised by ministers answerable to Parliament. Then there is the long and still increasing list of special powers conferred by Parliament on the King in council, on secretaries of state, and on many other executive officers and administrative bodies for purposes of both central and local government. In the foreign office, and I think there alone, the main part of the driving power is supplied by the ancient common-law prerogative—the mechanism of orders in council by which the foreign jurisdiction of the Crown is worked is a very special matter, which we have not to consider here. In some departments, as in the home office, we find a mixture of the two methods with statutory powers predominating. Departments of recent parliamentary creation like the local government board derive their authority wholly from the statutes which establish them. In every case, however, all acts of State are subject, irrespective of their formal character, to parliamentary criticism and control, enforced, in the last resort, by the legal right of the House of Commons to refuse supplies, but more commonly and effectually by its constitutional power of dismissing a government in which it has ceased to have confidence.

The secretary of state for foreign affairs is in exactly the same position, in point of law, as the other secretaries of state. Any one of them can perform the duties of any other, and this power is often found convenient for the transaction of minor departmental business, for all the secretaries of state can not always be at their posts. The secretaries of state "are all appointed, as the single secretary of state formerly was, by mere delivery to them of the seals of office, each being capable in point of law of performing the duties of all the departments." So it was declared in 1855 by the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Harrison v. Bush (5 E. & B., p. 352); which further points out that transfer to another secretary of state's department is therefore not such acceptance of a new office of profit under the Crown as vacates a seat in the House of Commons. (See for a further account, Anson, "The Law and Custom of the Constitution," vol. 2, pt. 1, 163–168.) Technically there are not several offices, but joint holders of one office, and the distribution of work among them (except where affected by special statutory provisions) is only matter of administrative arrangement. Moreover, there is no difference in legal quality between one executive act and another, however widely the degrees of their importance may differ. Declaration of war upon a great power, conclusion of an extradition treaty with a Central American State, appointment of a vice consul, are all the King's acts within his lawful authority, performed by the secretary of state as his servant; and courts of justice knew nothing more about them, nor in particular what the House of Commons may have to say to any of them or the possible political consequences. We may, therefore, dismiss the strictly legal aspect as not relevant to our question.

In the matter of constitutional usage the King's relation to his ministers is the main point. He is bound to follow their considered advice, but he is entitled to have full information of all important proceedings, and to discuss ministerial proposals in the light of that information. The Sovereign's right is the same in all departments, but with regard to the foreign office its exercise is of peculiar importance by reason of the King's special facilities for semiofficial communication with foreign princes and rulers and their envoys personally accredited to him. Such communications are made with the knowledge of the prime minister, the foreign secretary, or both. Thus the Sovereign has in this department a considerable field for using legitimate influence and giving personal assistance to his ministers; but they alone are answerable in Parliament for whatever action is finally taken, and the rule that the Sovereign's name must not be introduced in parliamentary discussion is no less applicable here than in all other affairs of state. In particular, the King sees all important outgoing dispatches; Queen Victoria was very firm on this point, and rightly (Anson, op. cit. 43, 44).

The residual executive power of the Crown—that is, in modern practice of the cabinet—is greater in foreign affairs than in any other branch of government. Even the cession of British territory is still formally within the prerogative. In 1890 Parliament was consulted by the Unionist Government of the day when Heligoland was ceded to Germany; Mr. Gladstone protested that this was an innovation, but it seems likely that the precedent will hold in future. (For details see Anson, op. cit., pt 2, 106–107.) War and peace, the making of treaties, participation in international conferences, and ratification of the resulting conventions, the constitution and administration of the diplomatic service, are all in the executive department; there is no coordinate authority resembling that of the Senate in the United States. Treaties are executed in the King's name under the great seal, and when the negotiations have been carried on by a dominion government (now a recognized practice in matters of commercial relations between some of the dominions and foreign countries) this makes no difference to the form. All is ultimately subject, of course, to parliamentary criticism and censure; but there is no custom or understanding that Parliament shall be consulted beforehand in any class of foreign affairs. It is to be observed that down to the end of the nineteenth century it was the tradition of British foreign policy not to enter into any definite alliance in time of peace, and therefore no need was felt for any special safeguard in that direction. Obviously no prudent ministry would venture on any new departure in foreign policy without being, in one way or another, assured of its ground. Certainly it may be said, and I think with too much truth, that attention to these matters in the House of Commons has been neither so continuous nor so competent as it ought to have been. That has nothing to do with the system. Ignorance and indifference in the House merely reflect the same state of mind in the constituencies. There has always been a group of well-informed members; in the last generation, for example, Lord Arthur Russell, Cartright, Kinglake, Grant Duff; but they have never been numerous or made much impression on the public. In the case of one man rather junior to these, Sir Charles Dilke, exceptional command of knowledge in this kind was joined with a large measure of general parliamentary ability and popular as well as expert statesmanship. I do not remember any other such case. The mass of electors know very little and care less about anything that does not visibly come home to them at their own doors; and it is not only the foreign office that for this reason lacks the tonic of rational criticism. Indian affairs are in no better plight, although the conditions are in some ways more favorable.

All things considered, the directors of British foreign policy for the last 20 or 30 years rather deserve commendation for their success in keeping in touch with public opinion so far as there can be said to be any public opinion. Right or wrong, the anti-Russian diplomacy of the nineteenth century was not unpopular; rightly, as almost all of us think, the entente policy of later years, and our cordial relations with the United States, have been popular.

As for the charges made against the foreign office in general terms of involving the nation in onerous engagements without the knowledge or consent of Parliament, I do not believe they have ever been verified in our time. The nearest approach to an example is the defensive treaty with Japan. Its conclusion, as was well known at the time or shortly afterwards, was a matter of urgency; there was no serious opposition when it was published, and the wisdom of making it has been abundantly justified by events.

Coming now to the relations between the foreign office and the House of Commons in current parliamentary usage, apart from any legal or constitutional question, we find that the lack of general intelligence and comprehension already noted has led to much time being wasted on petty curiosity and carping censure of details with small profitable results. The department is in a special manner exposed to captious questionings by the nature of the work it has to do. Our minister here and our envoys abroad are in constant communication with foreign Governments, and inevitably possessed to some extent of other people's secrets as well as our own; and to that extent reticence is a matter, not of policy but of obligation. It is easy to say there ought to be no secrets; but no man can say it advisedly and honestly who is acquainted at first hand with the conduct of any kind of important business, public or private. Is there any political association, shipping, or railway company, or any corporate body with interests beyond a narrow local radius, whose directors would consent to hold office on the terms of being bound to inform all their members, let alone the public at large, of the details of all their transactions at every stage? As a matter of fact, nothing gets done—hardly so much as a private marriage settlement or a contract for the sale of a few acres—without informal preliminary talk and correspondence, of which great part—as it is not, and is not meant to be, binding on either party—is not recorded. If foreign rulers had to be warned that whatever passes between their representatives and ours is liable to be called for in the House of Commons, and must be produced if demanded, the House would soon find that the amount of information at its disposal was very small indeed. Under any system of government the department of foreign affairs is unique in that it exists for the special purpose of communication and cooperation—and not only in political but in commercial and other strictly business matters—with independent powers over whom it has no control, and whose confidences it is bound to receive and respect as the first condition of obtaining any result at all.

I must not pursue this topic further, but of two things I am sure: One is that the cry for what is called democratic control of foreign policy is rooted in the wholly fallacious assumption that democratic States are uniformly or eminently pacific in their external relations; the other that, if those who demand it could have had their way during the last 20 or 30 years, we should more than once have been in imminent peril of war with at least one of our present allies.

There is yet another substantial reason for the position of the foreign office in face of the House of Commons being peculiar: The intimate connection of the foreign secretary's work with the prime minister's. The Government is responsible for all departmental action, but in a very special manner for that of the foreign office as being wholly executive and to a large extent discretionary. Therefore the prime minister, as the head and front of ministerial responsibility, has to be in constant and particularly close touch with the secretary of state for foreign affairs. Other departments performing administrative duties under statutory regulations can and do run of themselves for most of their ordinary purposes; not so the foreign office. In practice, under our normal scheme of cabinet government (for it is too soon to generalize from war conditions, nor is this the occasion to speculate on eventual permanent changes), the direction of foreign affairs is much more with the premier and the foreign secretary than with the cabinet as a whole. Here is an independent ground, and a good one, for parliamentary vigilance. But that vigilance can not be exercised to good effect without adequate information (I do not mean information of secret matters) and enlightened intelligence. Neither can we, on the whole, expect members of Parliament to be more instructed or interested in foreign or other affairs than their constituents require them to be. We come round, therefore, to the need for educating public opinion; to this end the press can do something, perhaps much; but the only sure way is to begin the process in our schools. Modern history must finally cease to be a secondary and dull examination subject ending with the Congress of Vienna. Here, again, however, temptation to digress must be resisted.

One immediate plan for the better instruction of the House of Commons, the formation of a standing committee on foreign affairs in which all parties should be represented, has able advocates. I have not such acquaintance with parliamentary procedure as would justify me in expressing any confident opinion of its working. But, in view of the promised reform of the House of Lords, I would humbly submit that it may be fit for consideration whether, if any such committee is desirable and practicable as an official institution, it might not be to the public advantage to make it a joint committee of both houses.

FREDERICK POLLOCK.

Mr. LODGE. I also desired yesterday, in speaking about the needlessness of this rule, to call attention to what the President said to Members of Congress at the adjournment of the first session, the war session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. He said:

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose I believe it has faithfully expressed. One can not examine the record of its action without being impressed by its completeness, its courage, and its full comprehension of a great task. The needs of the Army and the Navy have been met in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms, and the war-making branch of the Government has been abundantly equipped with the powers that were necessary to make the action of the Nation effective.

I believe that it has also in equal degree, and as far as possible in the face of war, safeguarded the rights of the people and kept in mind the considerations of social justice so often obscured in the hasty readjustment of such a crisis.

It seems to me that the work of this remarkable session has not only been done thoroughly but that it has also been done with the utmost dispatch—

And yet we have this rule—

the utmost dispatch possible in the circumstances or consistent with a full consideration of the exceedingly critical matters dealt with. Best of all, it has left no doubt as to the spirit and determination of the country, but has affirmed them as loyally and as emphatically as our fine soldiers will affirm them on the firing line.

That is printed as a foreword to "The First Session of the War Congress," by Charles Merz, published by the Committee on Public Information; and the foreword which contains this extract from the President's remarks is signed by Mr. George Creel. Only that short time ago Congress received the approbation of the President for its rapid dispatch of business, and we have in addition the approval of Mr. George Creel. Surely, nothing more can be said to show the rapidity with which Congress has worked.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Having in mind what the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has said on another occasion, I am a little at a loss to know whether he is condemning George Creel or commending what he says.

Mr. LODGE. I read the quotation, and I will leave it to the Senator to judge in what manner I am speaking of Mr. George Creel.

He has made other remarks about Congress that were less favorable in character, when he referred to examining their hearts as going into the slums—a remark which I believe he subsequently withdrew. But in the presence of such witnesses as the President of the United States and Mr. Creel, it seems to me that the necessity of this rule is not sustained.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Massachusets think, however, that in view of the discussion this evening as to the meaning of the language which the President uses, we ought to have a construction of that language before we accept it?

Mr. LODGE. Well, that is possible, and I think perhaps it would be beneficial. I do not wish, however, to be understood as using consistency as an argument, for I know it never is, but merely to show how rapidly opinions sometimes change.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in view of the last remark of the Senator from Massachusets, allow me to ask him a question. If the Senator from Massachusetts were in favor of the rule limiting debate, would he accept with equal conclusiveness the opinion of the President expressed against it?

Mr. LODGE. Against the rule?

Mr. CUMMINS. Against the limitation of debate.

Mr. LODGE. I was saying that the President sustained my view that it was needless; that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the Senator from Massachusetts is using the authority of the President—although I think it rather indirect—to sustain his views in opposition to the rule.

Mr. LODGE. Not my views in opposition to the rule. They proceed on much broader grounds than that. I am using the President simply to indicate that at that time, at the close of the last session, in October, he then held that Congress had proceeded with the utmost dispatch, which sustains my view that this new rule is not needed. That is only one point.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was wondering whether in all matters, especially those in which the Senator from Massachusetts may differ from the President, he will hereafter accept the evidence of the President with equal conclusiveness.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, because a man agrees with me on one thing, I certainly do not feel bound to agree with him on everything else. The President happened to agree with me then. I am glad to have his support.

I also wanted to call attention to a forgotten incident, which I merely desire to put in, as sometimes it is well to consider our past history.

There are many Senators here who will remember that in 1912 the Lorimer case was before the Senate. The President of the United States, at that time Mr. Taft, had made some public statements in regard to the Lorimer case. I think he may have written one or two letters or spoken to certain Senators in regard to it, he holding the view that Mr. Lorimer should be refused a seat in the Senate. A resolution was passed by the Senate at that time which was introduced by Senator Bailey, of Texas. The resolution was in these words:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of a President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate, or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate, would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution and invade the rights of the Senate.

That resolution, after debate, was passed by a vote of 35 to 23. I will not read the whole list.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I suggest to the Senator to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I will put the roll call in the RECORD. I will merely say now that every Democrat present voted for the resolution, with a few Republicans, and the nay vote was wholly Republican. So Mr. Bailey's resolution as amended was agreed to. I will ask to have the record of the vote printed, as it may interest Senators to look at it. Again I say that I do not suggest that consistency or inconsistency can ever be used as an argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILFLEY in the chair). Without objection, leave will be granted to print the vote in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 23, as follows:

So Mr. Bailey's resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know whether anyone desires to go forward with the discussion this evening, and if so I do not desire to suggest any program which would prevent it. However, I will say to the Senator in charge of the resolution that I do not desire to have my amendment voted on this afternoon for the reason that some Senators have left, not expecting a vote this afternoon. I would be willing, so far as this particular amendment is concerned, to agree to a vote upon it to-morrow at 1 o'clock. I think by that method we would not lose any time; we would, perhaps, gain time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I am desirous of at least proceeding far enough to vote on his amendment and the amendments thereto to-night, but if the proponent of the amendment prefers it, and the Senate is willing to fix 1 o'clock to-morrow as the time to vote on his amendment and all amendments to his amendment, that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would not the Senator prefer to have it not later than 1 o'clock?

Mr. BORAH. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree to that.

Mr. BORAH. We can vote on it not later than 1 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, we shall have to take a recess under those circumstances, or we could not consider the resolution in the hour before 1 o'clock.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I suspect a good many Senators are anxious to get away. I had expected to speak a very few minutes on the subject to-night. I am quite willing to defer what I may have to say until to-morrow. Of course, if the matter is taken up at once at the hour of convening, there will be plenty of time. I shall occupy only a few minutes. But if we were to have morning business and continue until 1 o'clock, I should hardly think it quite fair.

Mr. BORAH. The idea was that we would take a recess and the matter could come up at once to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose, of course, if the Senate agrees to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho to vote upon his amendment at 1 o'clock, it is with the understanding that we take a recess until 12.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to have it a little better understood what is the unanimous-consent agreement that is being proposed.

Mr. BORAH. I was about to propose a unanimous-consent agreement that we would vote upon the amendment which I have offered, with all other amendments to that amendment, not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think I shall object if I understand it, but I want to say this. That means that anyone can propose to the Senator's amendment just as important an amendment as the amendment itself, and that one Senator can stand here and speak from 12 to 1 and no other Senator can say a word about anything.

Mr. BORAH. That is true; but I doubt after two or three days' discussion if there will be any amendment of any particular moment to this amendment. I make this suggestion only in view of the fact that I do not want the amendment to come to a vote this afternoon, because some Senators have gone away who want to be here when the vote is taken and whom I want to be here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I entirely agree with the Senator about that. I would not want to vote on it unless there was a full attendance. I simply want to make this suggestion. Suppose there was no agreement, and we should take a recess until 12. If Senators want to speak upon this amendment, but not now, and can not speak for themselves, it seems to me that both these propositions are of sufficient importance so that every Senator should have an opportunity to speak once at least upon either the resolution or the amendment if he desires. There is not a third of the Senate here now, and there may be among the two-thirds absent many who have not yet spoken, but who would find themselves to-morrow troubled by this unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but I know of only one Senator, and the rest of them——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Senators frequently take a notion to speak without informing anyone in advance. The Senator from Ohio may in the course of his oration to-morrow suggest some points, and a great many Senators might feel a flow of inspiration welling up in them, and they could not possibly refrain from speaking.

Mr. BORAH. I do not like to have the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] referred to as an oration. He always debates.

Mr. POMERENE. I am obliged to the Senator from Idaho for entering that protest.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I meant to say disquisition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, as well as the Senator from Alabama, what is the necessity for voting upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho at that time. Why not permit the debate to continue and then after the debate is exhausted there may be other amendments suggested either to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho or to the original proposition before the Senate. Then a vote upon those amendments that may be offered can be taken, and we can finally culminate the matter by a vote upon the original resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I propose to go ahead with the debate now until it is exhausted; but the Senator from Idaho desires to have some Senators here in the morning who are not here to-night. I was merely accommodating him, the idea being that the debate on that particular amendment was about exhausted. If not, I would prefer to proceed. We have a quorum of the Senate, and it is only 5 o'clock. But if it is agreeable to all members of the Senate I am agreeable to the proposal of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I suggested it, Mr. President, because I do not desire to delay this matter, and yet at the same time I am in a position where I do not want it to come to a vote this afternoon. I thought by suggesting this program we would lose no time. However, if the Senator from Utah or any one else desires to debate the question I do not want to cut off any debate.

Mr. KING. I have no present intention of discussing the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. It did seem to me there was no necessity for fixing a time for voting upon it. Then, after the vote was taken on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, the debate might continue for several days upon the other propositions.

Mr. BORAH. We do not cut off debate on the other matters.

Mr. KING. I understand the proposition of the Senator from Idaho does not involve a vote upon the main question; but I do not see any necessity to fix a time for voting on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho in the absence of further discussion and possibly a determination to vote upon the entire subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am ready to vote, and I suppose most Senators are ready to vote, on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, but his proposition involves voting at not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow upon every amendment that may be proposed to his amendment, and we do not know yet what those amendments are. That is what I want to call to his attention, saying at the same time that I do not propose to object to doing it, but I wish he had not asked it, that is all. I do not desire to delay a vote on this matter at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senator from Utah if this arrangement is not satisfactory to him? If it is not I desire to proceed.

Mr. KING. I, of course, do not want to be put in the attitude of objecting to some procedure which seems to commend itself to the judgment of the Senate, but in my opinion the questions are somewhat correlated and it would be better to pretermit a vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho until after the discussion has proceeded for some time and we are practically ready to dispose of the entire matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand that the Senator is going to object if the proposal is made?

Mr. KING. Yes; I think I shall object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed with the debate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I would like to make an inquiry. Would not the Senator agree that the vote shall be taken not later than 2 o'clock to-morrow on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KING. If no other Senator wants to talk upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho I have not objection to voting now or voting at 1 o'clock or 2 o'clock, but I felt that there were some who might want to debate the subject, and it was in their interest and for their protection and not for anything I had in view personally that I have made the observations I have submitted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should have liked to get a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to-night. There is a quorum here and I wish to proceed, but I am trying to accommodate myself to the wishes of the Senator from Idaho who offered the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I am willing to call for a quorum, and if we can get it, and if the Senate seems to be represented and Senators can be gotten back, I would be perfectly willing to have the vote taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, in view of the fact that apparently no one desires to discuss the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, and in view of the further fact that the debate to-morrow, if we shall postpone a vote upon the amendment until to-morrow, might be limited, I suggest that a vote be taken upon that amendment not later than 2 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is not satisfactory to me. I would rather go on to-night. I would be willing to concede one hour to-morrow, and that is satisfactory to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would the Senator agree that no amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho should be offered after 1 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the original amendment is voted on at 1 o'clock, no amendment can be offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the Senator said he would be willing to postpone the vote until 2 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not willing to consent to that. I think we can dispose of it to-night, if we can not get a vote at 1 o'clock to-morrow. I am going to make the request so that it can be formally disposed of. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senator from Idaho and the amendments thereto shall be voted on not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow, and that the debate between 12 and 1 o'clock shall be under the 10-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Must we not have a roll call for a quorum?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not for a vote on an amendment. It is agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

The unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 1 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, June 12, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to S. Res. 235, and upon the amendment itself; and, further, that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the so-called Borah amendment or any amendment offered thereto.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 12, 1918, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 11, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Infinite and Eternal Spirit, through whose divine care and gracious providence we have been brought as individuals and as a Nation to the present hour, we bless Thee for Thy love and care and fervently pray for the continuation of the same, that we may fulfill to the uttermost our destiny in this life and be prepared for whatever awaits us in the great beyond.

We know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
We only know we can not drift
Beyond His love and care.

We are facing a world-wide crisis. All that we hold dear is in the balance; but our hearts still cling to Thee, and we feel sure that right will triumph at last, and victory crown the faithful, brave, and true in a world-wide peace; for Thou art God, and Thy will is supreme.

So we trust. So we pray, in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE (H. DOC. NO. 1159).

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report made by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the resolution of inquiry as to its employees who have been given deferred classification at the request of the commission be printed as a public document. It has already been printed in the RECORD of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that when an executive communication is referred to a committee of the House it becomes a public document without any more ceremony about it.

Mr. MADDEN. When the department makes a report to the House?

The SPEAKER. Yes; when it is referred by the Speaker, which was done yesterday.

Mr. MADDEN. All right. It was printed in the RECORD of yesterday.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague Mr. PRICE be excused from attendance on the sessions of the House until and including June 15, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that his colleague Mr. PRICE be excused until and including June 15. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-morrow so that we can go on with the sundry civil bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business for to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MOON presented the conference report and statement of the House conferees on the bill H. R. 7237, which was ordered to be printed under the rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will this conference report lie over under the rule?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It will not be called up to-day?

The SPEAKER. Oh, it could be called up by unanimous consent. Anything can be done in that way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is not customary to do it in that way. I make this inquiry merely for the convenience of Members who desire to know when the report will come up.

The SPEAKER. It can not come up to-day except by unanimous consent.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pension bill recently passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the pension bill recently passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I make the further request for unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD an address delivered by Senator LENROOT at a loyalty convention held recently in Lincoln, Nebr.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech made by Senator LENROOT recently in Lincoln, Nebr. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a rereference from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on the Judiciary of the bill (S. 4277) providing for the protection of the uniform of friendly nations, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, asks unanimous consent to refer the bill he mentions from his committee to the Judiciary Committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I also ask a rereference of the bill S. 4428, which provides punishment for civilians who assault officers of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps. I ask that this bill be referred from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks a rereference of Senate bill 4428 from his committee to the Judiciary Committee. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I think both these bills were rereferred the other day, but I have no personal objection to it. I simply direct attention to that.

The SPEAKER. It will not do any harm to rerefer them again. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District of Columbia legislation; and pending that I should be glad to arrive at an agreement as to the limit on general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I understand the gentleman's request, he seeks to have the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar that have been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now he seeks to limit general debate on any certain bill or on all of the bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On all of them, just as is customary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not recall any time in years back when the House has resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District measures when the request has been made to limit general debate on all measures that would be presented by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would say to the gentleman that that is the custom, and that on the last District day that very same thing was done.

Mr. WALSH. And I raised a question about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] informs me, as I was absent from the Chamber at that time on committee work, that he raised the question as to its being the proper procedure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Speaker held that that was the proper procedure.

Mr. WALSH. And I am still unconvinced.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman's motion to consider one bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I made the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation; in other words, bills on the Union Calendar reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Now, has the gentleman arrived at any conclusion about debate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If there is no demand for general debate, I would ask that it be dispensed with entirely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it all depends on what bills the gentleman is going to bring up as to whether there will be general debate. I do not see that there is anyone on this side who has any objection to limiting the debate to the measures under consideration. But there are bills on the calendar reported from the gentleman's committee that demand consideration under general debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The bills I purpose to call up are the weights and measures bill and the Washington Market Co. bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, of course both bills will require some explanation in general debate. It probably would be difficult to come to any agreement on that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I thought it could be done with a liberal debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MAPES. I think the gentleman himself would want to discuss one of these measures for an hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under ordinary circumstances I would; but I have filed what I regard as a very comprehensive report on the Washington Market Co. bill, and I express the hope that gentlemen have or will read it, and thereby general debate should be very greatly reduced.

Mr. MAPES. May I suggest that we go into Committee of the Whole without any arrangement about general debate? As far as I know no one wants to make any general discussion, but it will be confined to the bill under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I modify my request and ask that general debate be confined to the measures pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District bills on the Union Calendar, and pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bills be confined to the bills themselves. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky how many of the measures he expects to bring up, and whether they are war measures or of a war character.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not say that either of them is strictly so, but I do believe that they are very necessary bills.

Mr. WALSH. If they are not war measures, I do not think we ought to establish a precedent of this kind—of confining general debate to measures under consideration. That has been done on war measures, but I shall object to this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under this arrangement, what would be the limit of general debate on any one bill?

The SPEAKER. There is no limit to general debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist on his objection. In other words, it means the whole day might be frittered away and nothing accomplished.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has the remedy in his hands, to limit general debate on each measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What would the gentleman from Massachusetts suggest?

Mr. WALSH. I have no suggestion to make; I object to establishing a precedent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request and ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour on each bill, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] to control one half of the time and I control the other.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, pending his motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour on each bill, and that one-half of that time be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SMALL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District of Columbia business.

CHARTER OF THE WASHINGTON MARKET CO.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 10893) to repeal and annul certain parts of the charter and lease granted and made to the Washington Market Co. by act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Market Co.," approved May 20, 1870.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the desire, purpose, and intent of the United States to annul and hold for naught the lease made by Congress to the Washington Market Co. of reservation No. 7, in the District of Columbia, and to take over unto its own ownership, use, occupancy, and control the said grounds and buildings and improvements thereon, now held and occupied by the said market company and its tenants under authority of an act approved May 20, 1870, entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Market Co." and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

SEC. 2. That all of said market grounds and buildings together with all improvements thereon and therein, are hereby taken over and appropriated to and for the United States; the said taking over and appropriation of said grounds, buildings, and improvements shall become complete and final on July 1, 1918; and, until otherwise directed by Congress, the complete possession and control of said grounds, buildings, and improvements shall vest in the Secretary of the Interior.

Upon securing possession of said premises, the Secretary of the Interior shall first reserve so much of the grounds and space in said buildings as he may deem necessary for the use of the United States; and, after such reservation shall have been made, and until Congress shall otherwise direct, any remaining portion or portions of the said grounds, buildings, or improvements may be rented by the Secretary of the Interior to the present tenants or to any other person or persons for such rental as may be agreed upon by the parties; but in no event shall any part of the premises be subleased by the tenant; neither shall the rental charge for any booth or stall be greater than the rental now charged therefor; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered and directed to make and enforce such rules and regulations for the management and control of the said property as he may deem best for the enforcement of the provisions of said act.

The said Secretary shall not make or enter into any lease for any part of said premises for a longer period than three years; and all such leases and contracts shall be subject to cancellation and annulment by Congress at any time; and all revenues derived from said premises shall be the property of the United States.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, out of appropriations made by Congress from time to time for that purpose, to employ such persons and purchase such materials as may be essential to the operation or maintenance of said property, and for the proper management and control thereof; and he shall render a detailed report to Congress at the beginning of each regular term of all revenues derived from and expenditures made on the said property.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States, as soon as is practicable after the approval of this act, shall appoint a commission composed of three disinterested men, not more than one of whom shall be a resident of the District of Columbia, to appraise the said buildings and improvements thereon which were erected or made at the expense of the Washington Market Co., and which stand upon said reservation, and the possession and control of which shall have passed to the Secretary of the Interior as herein provided.

No one shall be appointed on said commission if he be either a Member of Congress or an ex Member thereof, nor if he be an officer or employee of the United States, nor if he be a stockholder in the market company, nor if he be a creditor of the market company or of any officer or stockholder thereof, nor if he be an officer or stockholder of any corporation which is a creditor of any officer or stockholder of the market company, nor if he be, directly or indirectly, interested financially in the market company or of any of its officers or stockholders.

Before entering upon the discharge of his duties, each member of said commission shall make oath before a justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to faithfully and impartially perform his duties according to law; and, at the same time, that he is qualified under the provisions of this section, which oath shall be spread upon the order book of said court.

SEC. 4. That the said commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to subpœna witnesses, with or without books or papers, before it for either of the parties, and to require such witnesses to testify under oath administered by the chairman of said commission; said commission shall give each party a full hearing on the question of what is a fair and just valuation of the buildings and improvements erected and made at the expense of the said market company on said premises.

Thereafter the said commission shall fix the amount to be awarded as a fair and just valuation of the buildings and improvements erected and made on said premises at the expense of the said market company, and shall give notice of the filing of its award to the parties in interest.

If either party be dissatisfied with the amount of the award, such dissatisfied party may take an appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia by taking the entire record, or a copy thereof, certified by the chairman or any two members of said commission, and filing it in the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, which court is hereby vested with jurisdiction to hear and determine such appeal; and the judgment rendered by said court shall be final.

The amount finally awarded, with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date the Secretary of the Interior shall have been given full possession and control of said property, to the date of the payment of the award, shall be paid by the United States to the Washington Market Co.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, by contempt proceedings or otherwise, to compel witnesses to obey the subpœnas hereinbefore provided for; to produce all records, and to testify before said commission, and generally to require observance of all reasonable rules and regulations adopted by the said commission.

SEC. 6. That a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be disbursed by the President, to pay said award and interest and to compensate the members of said commission and a secretary thereof to be chosen by said commission: Provided, That the compensation made the members of the commission and the secretary thereof shall not exceed $10,000.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to assign one or more of the attorneys in the Department of Justice to represent the interests of the United States before said commission and before the court of appeals, if an appeal should be prosecuted thereto, and generally to represent the United States in all steps and proceedings looking to the enforcement of this act.

SEC. 8. That all laws and acts, or parts of laws and acts to the extent that they are in conflict herewith, are hereby repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the report which I filed with this bill is No. 558, and I recommend it to the careful study and consideration of the membership. That report deals more at length with this question than I care to discuss it on this occasion. However, I do wish to say that the property of the Washington Market Co. on Pennsylvania Avenue, between Seventh and Ninth Streets, stands as a monument to one of the most discreditable pieces of legislation ever lobbied through Congress.

The Washington Market Co. sought a grant of this charter at a rental of $25,000 a year, coupled with other expensive and costly considerations, one of which was to erect a large building at the corner of Pennsylvania Avenue and Ninth Street on this property at a cost of approximately $700,000. Little by little they have caused to be done away with virtually every material consideration for which the charter was granted. Little by little it has had the rental reduced which it agreed to pay, and which in seeking the charter they were willing to pay. The charter was granted on May 20, 1870, and within a very short time thereafter, by a piece of unholy work, the rental was reduced to $20,000 a year, and then in a very short time thereafter again reduced to $7,500 a year. The charter under the grant of lease was for 99 years, for more than 106,000 square feet of land on Pennsylvania Avenue. I have been informed that in many of the States land leases of that character have been held not to be good unless year by year, or period by period, the rent was increased.

Approximately half a century ago the Washington Market Co. took that property at $25,000 a year. Now, after the lapse of that long time, they are paying less for it than they agreed to pay when they took it over. The lease has approximately half a century yet to run without any provision whatever for an increase in the rental, notwithstanding the fact that the value of the real estate has increased by leaps and bounds. When the Washington Market Co. was granted its lease for 99 years at a rental of $25,000 a year the land was valued at about $1.50 a square foot. Now they are paying less rental than they paid then, notwithstanding the value of the land is approximately now $12 a square foot. To me there was no sort of defense for that charter when it was granted, and the longer it runs the less defense there is for it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What was the rental when the charter was granted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Twenty-five thousand dollars a year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that was how long ago?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That was 48 years ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was the charter authorized by legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And what is the rental paid now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Seven thousand five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the value of the land has very largely increased?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It has increased from $1.50 a square foot to $12 a square foot.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has there been any legislation justifying the reduction of rental?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There has been none by Congress, but at that time there was a legislative body for the District of Columbia, and, as is set out at length in the report which I have filed, the owners of the Washington Market Co. were running the District of Columbia. They were the officers of the District of Columbia, and as the officers of the District of Columbia, by local legislative act they reduced the rental upon their own property, the market company.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the statement just made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is one that ought to have the attention of the committee. I would like to know just how it is possible, without sanction of Congress, for a condition of that kind to exist.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wondered, just as the gentleman from Pennsylvania now wonders. A research into the history of the whole transaction, as set out in the report, shows that this local legislative body did reduce that rental and that then an appeal was taken in an ex parte proceeding to the local courts and the local courts sustained it. I believe that that is binding and that we can not go behind it, and I will say in that connection that the $25,000 a year rental was to go toward the support of the poor of the District of Columbia. None of it was used for that purpose. Then the District of Columbia collected the rental and treated it as a revenue; and since 1878, by treating it as a revenue, has caused the United States to put up, under the half-and-half plan, a like sum. So that from 1878 until two years ago the United States not only did not collect the rents, but the District of Columbia did; and the United States by the transaction lost a like amount by contributing to the District of Columbia under the half-and-half plan. About two years ago I took the position that this rental was wrongfully paid to the District of Columbia, inasmuch as it was for the benefit of the poor, and that as the courts had held that the cestuis qui trust has failed that the trust itself also failed; and then the Comptroller of the Treasury decided the question presented by me and held that the United States was entitled to the rent—something like $175,000—that the District of Columbia had collected. It was returned by the District of Columbia to the United States, and since that time the $7,500 a year rental has been paid to the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the District of Columbia Commissioners have something to do with this matter?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They had nothing to do with the fixing of the rents.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in that connection will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what rentals are now paid the Washington Market Co. by the occupants, as compared with the rentals they paid originally at the time of the incorporation of the company?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No, I can not; I am not advised as to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make that inquiry based upon one provision of the original act of incorporation, which stated that the stalls in this market building should be auctioned off to any persons who wished to occupy them, and that that should be the rental of those stalls as long as they paid the rental.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that notwithstanding that provision of the charter the Washington Market Co. sought to oust all of the stall masters and to charge them a rental which they had fixed. Thereupon the stall masters went into litigation with the Washington Market Co., and pending the litigation which was for the purpose of ousting the stall masters, on the 16th or 17th of December, 1870 or 1871, I am not quite sure which, the whole thing was burned down, and that proved to be an effective way of ousting the stall masters. But that method was punished by Congress by requiring the Washington Market Co. to pay something like $70,000 for the property which had been thus destroyed by fire.

That is not all of that part of the story. Not only did this property burn down, accidentally or otherwise, the effect of which was to oust the stall masters, but shortly thereafter the stall masters secured financial backing and opened what they called the Northern Liberty Market, at the intersection of Seventh and K Streets NW. Then they concluded to hold three days' market on Pennsylvania Avenue, in the building of the Washington Market Co., and three days' market at the Northern Liberty Market. The officers and stockholders of the Washington Market Co. were dissatisfied with that arrangement and they sought to have the six-day market in their property, and they accomplished what they sought. One Sunday night Alexander Shepherd, who then held a prominent official position in the District of Columbia, and who was an officer of the Washington Market Co. and one of the principal stockholders, took several hundred men and went to the Northern Liberty Market and tore it down—absolutely destroyed it—letting it fall upon property and men alike; and, notwithstanding that the United States and the District of Columbia have paid large sums of money because of the damage caused in that wreck, lives also being lost, claims are still pending for reimbursement because of that wreckage.

In other words, no law, justice, right, honor, or human right has been permitted to stand in the way of the Washington Market Co.; and now, when we are in the midst of war, when the Washington Market Co. is paying only $7,500 a year rent for the 160,000 square feet of land that they control under the lease, they have rented, whether really or ostensibly I know not, a portion of the second and third floors to the Mammoth Amusement Co. for $4,000 a year, and then that company, which is nothing more nor less than a real estate man by the name of Fox, rents that part of the building back to the United States Government for $14,000 a year.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. I want to inquire what branch of the Government service entered into a contract with this amusement company for $14,000 a year after the District government and the United States Government itself refused to stand for a raise of $8,000 a year. What branch of the Government service is now occupying it at that enormous increase?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say——

Mr. NOLAN. I notice that page 3 of the report refers to it, but there is no statement as to what branch of the service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For nearly 25 years the Washington Market Co. has been renting to the United States and the District of Columbia a part of that property for more than they are paying for all of it. I do not recall just which particular branch of the United States Government is using the property, but I am informed, and I believe that I am reliably informed, that Mr. Charles F. Nesbitt, who is now connected with the Treasury Department in the insurance department that carries insurance on the lives of soldiers, the war-risk insurance, piloted somebody in the United States Government to that particular piece of property. And, in that connection, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that several years ago I made a statement on the floor of the House at some length showing conclusively that this man, Nesbitt, while then insurance commissioner for the District of Columbia, was a party to creating the Insurance Trust in this town which increased insurance rates from 100 per cent to 700 per cent upon the property. Just where he comes in as a go-between in this transaction I am not fully advised, but it is reasonably certain that he has figured in the transaction.

Now, I wish to invite attention to the fact that this bill does not repeal the charter of the Washington Market Co. It leaves that undisturbed, but it deprives it of the use of the land owned by the United States for which they pay almost no rental at all. It owns other real estate. The charter requires the Washington Market Co. to maintain water-closets on its property.

By another slick trick they got rid of one corner of the property and turned it over to the United States, and on that little diagonal-shaped piece of land the United States Government and the District of Columbia have, at much expense, erected a water-closet which the Market Co. under the charter should have erected. In other words, they have beaten the United States in this entire transaction from the beginning until now.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. Did the District Committee give any consideration to the relocation of a market house?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. Under this bill the market property shall stand there, but instead of having the Washington Market Co. gouge the United States, the United States shall operate it and use such part of it for its own purposes as it desires to use.

Mr. NOLAN. I understand that is the purpose of the bill——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But just let me say that the United States constantly is buying real estate on that side of Pennsylvania Avenue and paying enormous prices for it, while they are virtually giving land to the Market Co.——

Mr. NOLAN. That is the point I wanted to inquire about. That property is very valuable and necessary for governmental use, and sooner or later the Government ought to give some consideration toward relocating a market site on less valuable property, and property that will be more suitable for market purposes and really in a better location and more convenient for the population of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The United States Government should not permit the Washington Market Co. to retain this property for another half century at this trifling rental. The truth of the business is it should not rent it at all. This lease should never have been granted, and it was granted under conditions which all of us, out of pride for our country, must hope will never be repeated in our history.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I was called out of the Hall, and probably the gentleman answered in my absence; but I understand this lamentable state of affairs is directly due to the fact that the Government made one lease to a private party and that private party made another lease at a tremendous profit. Now, what is responsible for that state of things, and what is the remedy?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Congress of the United States, yielding to the importunities of political influence in 1870, to which it should not have yielded, granted this charter. That Congress is responsible for a part of it, and whoever rented only a portion of this property for the United States and agreed to pay $14,000 a year rental for it is also to be blamed. I do not know who he is. I have not gone into that feature of it.

Mr. HICKS. Is there any way by which we can cancel that contract between the Government and the Washington Market people?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I suppose it can be canceled only in the way now sought to cancel it.

Mr. HICKS. That, in the gentleman's judgment, will cancel the other lease, too?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That would cancel the Government lease but permit the Government to retain the use of the property as its own property, and the Government would not be the lessee in the premises, but would be the lessor or owner.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. NOLAN. How long a lease has the Government got on this property at $14,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not ask.

Mr. NOLAN. We are now purchasing a piece of property for this War-Risk Insurance Bureau. My impression is they ought to remove the bureau down to the new Arlington site.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. The subject of rental of quarters for the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance was given consideration by the Committee on Appropriations. That bureau was greatly pressed for quarters immediately following the passage of the war-risk insurance act. They were obliged to take occupancy of any available space that was within the District. The gentleman is aware of the development of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. In January last they were employing nearly 2,000 clerks. Some of their activities were lodged in the building of the National Museum; others were lodged in Convention Hall; other activities were lodged in the Washington Market building; others in the Elks' Home. The lease of that market building is merely for a year, and the rental, according to the rental of private property, is not exorbitant. It is exorbitant when compared with the rental the Mammoth Amusement Co. pays to the Washington Market Co., but the rental paid by the War-Risk Insurance Bureau for the second and third floors is not what you may call exorbitant.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to ask how much time I have used, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I had only 30 minutes, I will be glad if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] will now use part of his time. And I reserve the remaining five minutes that I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, the report that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia submitted on this bill covers very fully the history of the Washington Market Co., and does not leave very much in addition to be said.

Congress originally authorized the lease of the ground now occupied by the Washington Market Co. and a little additional ground in front of the present buildings of the Market Co. for $25,000 per year. At the same time it provided for the incorporation of the Washington Market Co. at a capital stock of $1,000,000, and named the incorporators in the act. The corporation was organized, but only $150,000 was ever subscribed or paid in by the incorporators. Subsequently, about two years after the incorporation of the company, through an act of Congress authorizing the then council of the District to sell the little strip of land in front of the Market Co., the council entered into an agreement with the Market Co. by which the rent was reduced from $25,000 to $7,500 per year, and the Market Co. has paid the latter amount ever since that time to the Government.

To my mind, it is not necessary to go into the history of the organization of this company or the influences that were brought to bear to secure the legislation authorizing the lease of the ground occupied by the Market Co. or that were used to get the rental reduced in order to favor this bill. It is a question of business and of properly protecting the rights of the Government. Here is a piece of property that is assessed for $800,000, and the Washington Market Co. is paying a rental for it of only $7,500 per year. The assessed valuation is two-thirds of the real valuation. So that the Market Co. is paying $7,500 a year for property that is worth $1,200,000. Since the leasing of the property originally, the Market Co. has put up the buildings and made the improvements now on the ground, and those improvements are assessed for $460,000.

The act of 1870 provided for the lease of this property for 99 years, with a proviso that the lease could be terminated at the end of 30 years, at the discretion of the city authorities, by paying for the improvements upon the property. As we all know, the city council and the office of mayor were abolished by the organic act of 1878, and Congress now is the sole legislative authority over the District, so that if the lease is to be terminated it must now be done by Congress. I would like to call that proviso to the attention of the members of the committee. I read from the Statutes at Large, Volume XVI, page 127, section 12, of the act creating the Washington Market Co., as follows:

Provided, That if the corporation of the city of Washington shall, after a period of 30 years from the approval of this act, by a vote of the council thereof, express a desire to possess itself of the said market buildings and grounds, Congress may authorize the corporate authorities to take possession of the same upon payment to the said Market House Co. of a sum of money equal to a fair and just valuation of the buildings and improvements then standing on said grounds, and the mode and manner of ascertaining such valuation shall be determined by Congress.

It is under the authority of that proviso that this bill is reported by the District Committee. The bill provides for the appointment of a commission to determine the valuation of the improvements on the land and for the payment to the Market Co. of that value.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. GARD. I was interested in the gentleman's reading from the report. Does the gentleman think there is any vested contract created now by reason of their not having been an effort made in 30 years to dispossess the market company?

Mr. MAPES. I do not believe so.

Mr. GARD. Does it say 30 years or after 30 years?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. After 30 years.

Mr. MAPES. After 30 years. I was not reading from the report. I was reading from the act creating the Washington Market Co. in 1870, the act passed by Congress. This bill, Mr. Chairman, proceeds under the authority granted by the statute. It does no one any harm. It pays the Market Co. for the value of its buildings and it simply protects the Government of the United States from leasing property that is worth $1,200,000 for $7,500 per year for the next 51 years.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It was brought out that the original rental of the property was $25,000 a year?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. And that the authorities of the District of Columbia reduced it to $7,500; but recently under its acts Congress has complete legislative power over the District?

Mr. MAPES. Congress has complete legislative power over the District.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then at that time why did they not demand the full charter rental of $25,000 a year?

Mr. MAPES. The Supreme Court has held that the lease at $7,500 per year is legal, and that under the agreement between the Market Co. and the former council of the District no larger payment could be required.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. In the Supreme Court case it was then decided that the $7,500 was a legal lease?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. And it was decided that the District of Columbia authorities had the right to reduce that rent?

Mr. MAPES. As I understand it, the council, after the passage of the act fixing the rental at $25,000 per year, was authorized by the Congress to sell the strip of land in front of the market building upon which there is now a comfort station; to abandon the lease—not to sell it, but to abandon the lease—on that part of the ground, and the council agreed to reduce the rental to $7,500 per year in consideration of the surrender of that land.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Then the Market Co. did not have as much property as they had in the original charter?

Mr. MAPES. They have a smaller tract of land than before.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. For that reason the rental was reduced?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. It is true, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has brought out in the report, that several of the men high in authority in the government of the District were incorporators and stockholders and officers in this Washington Market Co.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit just here, I would like to say to the gentleman that when the Washington Market Co. got that small portion of ground released from that which was included in the original lease they got rid of the necessity of building a $700,000 house, which under the charter they were required to erect.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. And they thereby saved the difference between $25,000 and $7,500?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. They not only got rid of the expenditure of $700,000, but on that pretense they also got the rental reduced.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Probably the land taken away from them was a burden to them at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They wanted to get rid of it so that they would not be compelled to erect the $700,000 house.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the cost of the improvements that were put on this property by the company in lieu of the $700,000 that they were to spend under the original lease in improvements?

Mr. MAPES. The buildings are assessed at present for $460,000. That is supposed to be two-thirds of the real value.

Mr. ROBBINS. In that view of it, the improvements put on are much less in value than they were intended to be under the covenant of the original agreement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Michigan will again permit, I will say that the $700,000 house was to be a city hall and a hotel for the accommodation of the public, and it is so set out in the charter.

Mr. MAPES. And was to be separate and apart from the market building.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; separate and apart from the market building; and it is the market building that they have erected.

Mr. ROBBINS. As a matter of fact, they have erected a two-story building, the first story being a market and the upper story a hall, which has been rented, as stated, for the purposes indicated?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; a two or three story building.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is this man Sheppard, mentioned in this report of the chairman of the committee as one of the incorporators of this company——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Sheppard was one of the governors of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the same man whose monument stands down there in front of the Municipal Building?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the same man.

Mr. MAPES. He was known as "Boss Sheppard."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and it might not be out of the way to say that Mr. Sheppard's transactions here along the lines that are now being discussed grew to such proportions that between two suns he fled to Mexico and remained there quite a while before he came back here. I believe the Washington Star was the inaugurator of the movement to erect a monument to his memory, and it is quite worthy of notice that that monument, in which he has been portrayed in bronze, has a scroll in one hand, which might be a contract, and he had the other hand behind him.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask another question of the gentleman. This bill, of course, is intended to forfeit and annul the lease of that property to the Market Co.?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. And to return the property to the United States?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; upon the payment of the value of the improvements to the Market Co.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is this based upon the ground of forfeiture; that is, that the company has not complied with the terms of the original contract, thereby laying the ground for forfeiture, or is it an enterprise on the part of the United States to retake this property because of the noncompliance with the original terms of the lease? What is the ground of equity upon which we are proceeding, if we have any ground?

Mr. MAPES. We are proceeding, among other things, under the authority of the original act, which contained a proviso to the effect that at the end of 30 years the authorities could take the property over by paying the Market Co. the value of the improvements.

Mr. ROBBINS. At the end of 30 years?

Mr. MAPES. After 30 years.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is there such a reservation in the lease?

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman evidently did not hear the first part of my remarks, because I read that provision of the statute which expressly provides that after 30 years the District authorities could take the property over.

Mr. ROBBINS. You are proceeding under that clause in the act that pertains to the District of Columbia under which this Market Co. was created? Is that the fact?

Mr. MAPES. There is such a clause in the act creating the Market Co. and providing for the lease of the land.

Mr. ROBBINS. One other question, and that is whether the several tenants of this Market Co. who have entered into bona fide leases with the company and are paying full and adequate rental for the premises they occupy, such as the stall holders in the market, are protected? If there are such, is this proceeding going to put a hardship upon them?

Mr. MAPES. The bill provides that their leases shall not be interfered with, but without any such provision in the bill I suppose their leases would be subject to the law under which the Market Co. was incorporated. But the bill takes care of that.

Mr. ROBBINS. The bill proposes to see that there is no hardship imposed upon innocent lessees?

Mr. MAPES. I think we are proceeding very cautiously and very equitably, and I think that no one can complain, unless the Market Co. expects the Government to make it a gift of this property for another 51 years.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am in hearty sympathy with the purposes of the bill and its object. I was only thinking of innocent lessees who are not responsible for this outrage upon the Government, which this lease undoubtedly is.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield to the gentleman from New York for one minute.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, the House has been very kind to me in allowing me to insert in the RECORD various matters pertaining to the flag of the United States. As I have already placed a number of articles in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to exercise again the privilege of so doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have some doubt whether this measure will ever be written upon the statute books. I think very likely that the proposition to take over this property is one that deserves consideration; but I think the proper way perhaps to have accomplished it would have been for the Congress to appoint a special committee to procure all the facts and data, and to give that committee or commission authority to summon people before it in order that it might have authentic information.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That very thing has been done.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, there is quite a little information that the gentleman has not been able to give the committee. For instance, he does not know how this lease for $14,000 came to be made, who made it, or how long it is to run. Of course the Government had to pay that rental. They had to have the space, because this War-Risk Insurance Bureau had to be put upon a working basis in the shortest possible space of time. But that rental, exorbitant as it is, is only in keeping with other prices that are demanded and received here in Washington. This is the home of the profiteer. It does not make any difference whether it is a landlord, an amusement company, a taxicab company, a boarding-house keeper, a merchant, or any other activity, the profiteers find in Washington a most fertile field, and the influence of the example that they set goes trickling out to the country, and consequently we hear of the same thing far from the seat of government. The Congress attempted to control that situation by passing the Saulsbury resolution, which very quickly found its way to the docket of the Supreme Court, and action will be had upon that, I suppose, at the fall term. That was passed in an attempt to curb profiteering in rentals; but, as the President said in his last address to this House, conscience and love of country do not seem to curb the desire to profit at the expense of the Government in this great struggle. I do not quote his words exactly, but I think that expresses the thought; and it is a shame and a disgrace that here in the National Capital we should see examples of extravagant and exorbitant prices, and the Government in many instances being held up by the throat and compelled to pay them.

Here is an instance cited in this report of this amusement company renting this place for $4,000 and then leasing it to the Government for $14,000. Of course, we can not criticize the officials of the Government for paying that, because they had to have that space. I submit that the history of this transaction is such as to warrant Congress taking some action. It should have acted long ago. I do not know whether we ought to cancel this lease—whether we ought to take this property over again—but certainly something should be done. My suggestion was that we might have a special committee or a subcommittee of the District Committee invested with power to make a thorough investigation and given authority to summon persons before them, with books and papers, in order that they might come in here with a proposition based upon fullest information. I have some doubt as to whether the proviso in the statute referred to and read by the gentleman from Michigan, giving the city of Washington authority, after 30 years, to abrogate the provisions of this lease, was transferred to the Congress when the charter of the city was canceled and annulled, unless something in the organic act creating the District government reserved that right to it; and it might be argued——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I should like two minutes more.

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for yielding me time to complete this sentence. I think it might well be contended that that right, not having been availed of by the city during its existence, upon the cancellation of the city's charter and the creation of the District of Columbia under the organic law—that right not having been availed of, it ceased or lapsed, and the lease must necessarily continue in full force and effect, and could only be canceled for some violation of its terms. But I think those questions should have been looked into by a special committee, such as was had when a former Congress authorized a committee to go into the half-and-half problem. And, as I stated, I have some doubt whether this legislation will become a law, because, as we all know, after we act on it it has to go away from here, and sometimes people there find ways of putting obstacles in the path of passing measures that are intended for the public benefit of the District. I have some doubt whether it will eventually pass. I submit that in my humble opinion it would have have been wiser to have had a special committee or a subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee given the power to investigate this matter carefully and to ascertain just what are the rights of the Congress or of the District of Columbia under existing conditions. I am perfectly willing, upon the facts as set forth in this report, to give my support to a proper measure. I think this bill is a little faulty in some of its phraseology and possibly might be capable of being improved by amendment, but I trust that the committee will consider the suggestion I have made and will set forth the reasons why some deeper investigation was not made.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I wish to say that it has been decided a number of times who is the successor of the old city of Washington. That was thoroughly gone into, and it is no longer a question. But the proceedings contemplated in the bill are based upon more than one ground.

If the gentleman will notice, in the first part of the bill a legislative condemnation is provided. In the next place, the annulment of the lease—not the repeal of the charter but the annulment of the lease—is asked for in compliance with the provision of the act of Congress that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has just read—the provision as to the expiration of the 30 years. In the next place, the annulment of the lease is asked because the Washington Market Co. has, in a number of instances which are set out in the report, violated its terms of lease.

As to the commission suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, every important fact has been ascertained and is indisputably set out in the report. The question as to what man conducted the negotiations by which a part of this property has been rented to the United States Government is not material. Who he is is a matter of no moment, just here, at least. Here are the great facts upon which this lease should be annulled.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman will recall that this matter has been before the District Committee in one way or another for five years?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. At least that long, and it has been before Congress repeatedly. A Senate committee on one occasion had extended hearings and made a voluminous report, which is referred to in this report. That report was the Morrill report. But, as usual, nothing was done after the report was filed. The gentleman from Massachusetts referred to the investigation of the half-and-half plan between the Government and the District of Columbia. I find that the report of that special committee to-day is sought to be repudiated by another body. I am never in favor of these special investigations, because they result in nothing except delay and the thwarting of justice.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and also to insert some extensions in remarks that I made on the 29th of May last.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has a minute and a half and the gentleman from Michigan four minutes.

Mr. MAPES. I have no further requests for time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Neither have I, and I will ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the desire, purpose, and intent of the United States to annul and hold for naught the lease made by Congress to the Washington Market Co. of reservation No. 7, in the District of Columbia, and to take over unto its own ownership, use, occupancy, and control the said grounds and buildings and improvements thereon, now held and occupied by the said market company and its tenants under authority of an act approved May 20, 1870, entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Market Co.," and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the chairman of the committee where does he find the phraseology such as is retained in lines 2 and 4 in this section in any other act? Is it not a little unusual to set out the desire of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I first came across that language, or language very similar, in a bill which was prepared by ex-Representative Lewis, of Maryland, several years ago for the purpose of taking over the telephone lines.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman will not find that language in any statute in the books.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. At that time I made some investigation of it and became perfectly satisfied that that or similar language amounted to a legislative condemnation.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman may have found the language in bills that have been introduced, and may have found included in it the words "fond hope," but it seems to me the phraseology would be more in keeping with the statutes that we have passed if it read, "It is hereby declared to be the intent and purpose of the United States," and so forth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no objection at all to striking out the word "desire."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the language by striking out the words "desire, purpose, and intent," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "intent and purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "desire, purpose, and intent" and insert in lieu thereof the words "intent and purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I would like further, Mr. Chairman, to ask the chairman of the committee with reference to the phraseology of the words "hold for naught." Is that customary language?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not believe there is any customary language, because these proceedings are so very rare. Whether somebody else in years gone by has used different language is no reason why this language is not good.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the gentleman knows that in enacting statutes which inevitably will be construed by the court, if we put it in legal phraseology it will be much easier of construction by the courts.

Mr. RUCKER. That language will be found sometimes in the annulling of leases.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] states that that language is found sometimes in the annulling of leases.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have picked up that expression somewhere around the courthouses.

Mr. WALSH. I have no further objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all of said market grounds and buildings, together with all improvements thereon and therein, are hereby taken over and appropriated to and for the United States; the said taking over and appropriation of said grounds, buildings, and improvements shall become complete and final on July 1, 1918; and, until otherwise directed by Congress, the complete possession and control of said grounds, buildings, and improvements shall vest in the Secretary of the Interior.

Upon securing possession of said premises, the Secretary of the Interior shall first reserve so much of the grounds and space in said buildings as he may deem necessary for the use of the United States; and, after such reservation shall have been made, and until Congress shall otherwise direct, any remaining portion or portions of the said grounds, buildings, or improvements may be rented by the Secretary of the Interior to the present tenants or to any other person or persons for such rental as may be agreed upon by the parties; but in no event shall any part of the premises be subleased by the tenant; neither shall the rental charge for any booth or stall be greater than the rental now charged therefor; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered and directed to make and enforce such rules and regulations for the management and control of the said property as he may deem best for the enforcement of the provisions of said act.

The said Secretary shall not make or enter into any lease for any part of said premises for a longer period than three years; and all such leases and contracts shall be subject to cancellation and annulment by Congress at any time; and all revenues derived from said premises shall be the property of the United States.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, out of appropriations made by Congress from time to time for that purpose, to employ such persons and purchase such materials as may be essential to the operation or maintenance of said property, and for the proper management and control thereof; and he shall render a detailed report to Congress at the beginning of each regular term of all revenues derived from and expenditures made on the said property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "on July 1, 1918," in lines 9 and 10, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty days after the approval of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the words "on July 1, 1918," and insert in lieu thereof the words "sixty days after the approval of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise for the purpose of obtaining information from the chairman of the committee. I inquired of the gentleman whether he was acquainted with the rental charges that were paid by the occupants of the various stalls. I notice that in the original act it provided that stalls should be auctioned off and that that rate should be continued as long as the occupants would pay the rent. The chairman of the committee stated that he had no information as to what was being charged for the use of booths and stalls. Here we have a provision at the bottom of page 2 which is mandatory, prescribing that the rental charged for any booths or stalls shall not be greater than the rental now charged therefor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That was put in to protect the stall master.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the stall master is not paying a reasonable rental, or if the charges are unequal as compared with others, why should not the Government, through the Secretary of the Interior, have the right to charge a reasonable rental for the premises?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Several years ago I read the entire record in the case of Hoffman against the Washington Market Co., and in that record I saw all this discussed; but I am not now able to recall the figures at which the stalls were rented. It is my impression, and that impression was strengthened by the talk that I had with an old gentleman, Mr. Killeen, who is more than 80 years old and who used to be a stall renter down there, that some of the stalls are now renting for something like $30 each.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. In the statement of the Washington Market Co., which was prepared about 4 years ago, when the gentleman from Kentucky first introduced a bill to repeal this license, I find a statement that the butchers' stands were renting for $144.

Mr. STAFFORD. One hundred and forty-four dollars a year. Can the gentleman give the size of those stalls for which that rent is charged?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think about 12 by 25 feet. Mr. Killeen told me that several days ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we make this provision limiting the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to charge only the rentals that are now charged? Of course, the rentals will change according to the value of the property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And the rent become greater as the property grows in value?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the reason why I took the floor to make the inquiry. I should say that the words in that clause should be stricken out and a clause substituted whereby the Secretary of the Interior would be vested with authority to charge a reasonable rental for the premises.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That follows in another part of the bill, at least by implication. The Secretary would have the right to do that if the language to which the gentleman refers should be stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman from Kentucky object to a motion to strike that out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I shall not oppose it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment and in lieu thereof offer the following amendment, to strike out on page 2, beginning with the word "neither," in line 24, down to the word "therefor," in line 1 on page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 24, strike out the words "neither shall the rental charge for any booth or stall be greater than the rental now charged therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the said commission shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to subpœna witnesses, with or without books or papers, before it for either of the parties, and to require such witnesses to testify under oath administered by the chairman of said commission; said commission shall give each party a full hearing on the question of what is a fair and just valuation of the buildings and improvements erected and made at the expense of the said market company on said premises.

Thereafter the said commission shall fix the amount to be awarded as a fair and just valuation of the buildings and improvements erected and made on said premises at the expense of the said market company, and shall give notice of the filing of its award to the parties in interest.

If either party be dissatisfied with the amount of the award, such dissatisfied party may take an appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia by taking the entire record, or a copy thereof, certified by the chairman or any two members of said commission, and filing it in the office of the Clerk of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, which court is hereby vested with jurisdiction to hear and determine such appeal; and the judgment rendered by said court shall be final.

The amount finally awarded, with interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date the Secretary of the Interior shall have been given full possession and control of said property, to the date of the payment of the award, shall be paid by the United States to the Washington Market Co.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I assume that the authority vested in this commission is to carry out the authority in the original act vesting in the corporation of the city of Washington after a period of 30 years, by a vote of the councils, upon expressing a desire to possess itself of the said market buildings when Congress might authorize the authorities to take possession of the same upon payment to the market company of a sum equal to a fair valuation of the buildings and the improvements.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I said a few moments ago, in answer to a statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that the bill was drafted upon three ideas, one a legislative condemnation, another upon that provision of the charter which relates to the 30 years, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin has just referred, and another because the terms of the charter have been violated. The bill is based upon all three.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be disbursed by the President, to pay said award and interest and to compensate the members of said commission and a secretary thereof to be chosen by said commission: Provided, That the compensation made the members of the commission and the secretary thereof shall not exceed $10,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I assume that the purpose of the proviso is that the total compensation to be paid to the members of the commission and the Secretary shall not exceed $10,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the purpose, and I thought it was quite clearly expressed. However, if the gentleman can offer a suggestion which will express it more certainly, I shall be glad to agree with him.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought it somewhat ambiguous, as some might claim that the compensation of each member of the commission should not aggregate the sum of $10,000. That ambiguity might be removed by the insertion of the word "total" before the word "compensation."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will offer an amendment, I shall be glad to support it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I offer the following amendment, to insert before the word "compensation," in line 13, the word "total."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 13, before the word "compensation," insert the word "total."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] offered an amendment to which I did not object, by which the word "desire" was stricken from line 3, on page 1. At that time I did not recall why I had used the word "desire." A few moments ago the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] was reading the congressional act iself, and I find that the act contains the word "desire," and I now take it for granted that that was the reason I used the word in drafting the bill. The language of the act to which I refer reads:

Provided, That if the corporation of the city of Washington shall, after a period of 30 years from the approval of this act, by a vote of the councils thereof express a desire to possess itself of the said market company, buildings, and grounds—

And so forth. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to return to page 1 and annul the proceedings by which the amendment was adopted, so that we may restore the language just as it was used originally in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to section 1, page 1, to vacate the proceedings and restore the language as originally reported in the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "intent and purpose," and insert in lieu thereof the words "desire, purpose, and intent."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I offered an amendment, on the spur of the moment, by inserting the word "total" before the word "compensation." It has been suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] that the purpose would be better accomplished by inserting the words "in the aggregate" after the word "not," and I ask unanimous consent to return to section 6 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to section 6, to vacate the proceedings, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment inserting the word "total" was adopted and to substitute in lieu thereof, after the word "not," in line 15, the words "in the aggregate."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 15, after the word "not," insert the words "in the aggregate."

The CHAIRMAN. Did not the gentleman intend those words to succeed the word "exceed"?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; "shall not in the aggregate exceed $10,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES LAW, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I now desire to call up the bill H. R. 10887.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10887) to amend the act entitled "An act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That there is hereby created an executive department in the government of the District of Columbia, which shall be known as the department of weights, measures, and markets. Such department shall be in charge of a superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, who shall be appointed by, and be under the direction and control of, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall receive a salary of $2,500 per annum. He shall have the custody and control of such standard weights and measures of the United States as are now or shall hereafter be provided by the District of Columbia, which shall be the only standards for weights and measures in said District.

"The commissioners are also authorized to appoint, on the recommendation of the superintendent, such assistants, inspectors, and other employees for which Congress may, from time to time, provide.

"SEC. 3. That the superintendent shall, before entering upon the performance of his duties, give bond to the District of Columbia in the penal sum of $5,000, signed by two sureties or by a bonding company, to be approved by the commissioners, conditioned on the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation before the commissioners that he will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, which bond and oath shall be deposited with the commissioners.

"SEC. 4. That the superintendent and under his direction his assistants and inspectors shall have exclusive power to perform all the duties provided in this act. They shall from time to time inspect, test, try, and ascertain whether or not they are correct all weights, scales, beams, measures of every kind, instruments, or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring, and all tools, appliances, or accessories connected with any or all such instruments or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring, used or employed in the District of Columbia, by any owner, agent, lessee, or employee in determining the weight of persons and the weight, size, quality, extent, area, or measurement of quantities, things, produce, or articles of any kind offered for distribution, consumption, transportation, sale, barter, exchange, hire, or award, and shall seal, stamp, or mark, in the manner prescribed by the commissioners, such as conform to the standards kept in the office of the superintendent, and shall seize and destroy or mark, stamp, or tag with the word, "Condemned," such as do not conform to the standards, and shall also mark the date of such condemnation upon the same. Any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device of any kind which shall be found to be unsuitable for the purpose for which it is intended to be used or of defective construction or material shall be condemned. No person shall use or having the same under his control shall permit to be used for any of the purposes enumerated in this section any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device whatsoever unless the same has been approved in accordance with the provisions of this act.

"Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any unapproved scale, weighing instrument, or nonportable measure or measuring device subject to inspection or test under the provisions of this act, shall notify the superintendent in writing at his office, giving a general description thereof, and the street and number or other location where same may be found, and it shall be the duty of the superintendent to cause the same to be inspected and tested within a reasonable time after receipt of such notice. Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any portable unapproved measure or measuring device, subject to inspection or test, shall cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection or test.

"Every peddler, hawker, or other transient merchant shall, before using any such weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device, cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection or test semiannually, and shall not use any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device which has not been approved within six months prior to the time of such use.

"Nothing herein shall be construed to require the superintendent to test any weighing or measuring device belonging to the United States.

"SEC. 5. That no person shall use, or having the same under his control, permit to be used, any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device, or any attachment or part thereof after the same has been altered or repaired without the same having first been reinspected and reapproved, and no person shall alter, obliterate, detach, obscure, or conceal any seal, stamp, mark, tag, or label attached or impressed by the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors.

"SEC. 6. That no person shall neglect, fail, or refuse to exhibit any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device to the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors for the purpose of inspection and test, and no person shall in any manner obstruct, hinder, or molest the superintendent or any of his assistants, inspectors, or other employees in the performance of their duties.

"SEC. 7. That the superintendent shall keep in his office a record of weighing and measuring devices inspected, which record shall show the type of device, the name and address of the owner, the date of inspection, and whether the same was approved or condemned. Such record shall be open to the public during regular office hours.

"SEC. 8. That no person shall sell, offer for sale, keep, or expose for sale anywhere in the District of Columbia any commodity of any kind as a weight, measure, or numerical count greater than the actual or true weight, measure, or numerical count thereof, and no person shall take or attempt to take more than the actual and true weight, measure, or numerical count of any commodity, when as buyer he is permitted by the seller to determine the weight, measure, or numerical count.

"All commodities sold by terms of weight shall be weighed with scales, weights, or other weighing device which shall have been duly inspected and approved as provided in this act. All commodities sold by terms of measurement shall be measured with, by, or in a measure, measures, or measuring device which shall have been inspected and approved as provided in this act.

"SEC. 9. That when any commodity is sold by weight, it shall be understood to mean net weight. When any commodity, except coal, is sold by the ton, it shall be understood to mean 2,000 pounds avoirdupois. Coal shall be sold by the long ton, consisting of 2,240 pounds avoirdupois.

"SEC. 10. That no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained, within the District of Columbia any coin-in-the-slot machine or automatic vending device without placing in charge thereof some responsible person. No such machine shall be maintained for use when the same is not in perfect working order, and the person in charge as well as the owner of such machine or device shall be held responsible for operating or maintaining any such machine or device which is not in perfect working order. A sign or placard shall be placed on every such machine or device in a conspicuous place and shall contain the name of the owner and of the person in charge of such machine or device, and shall state that the person in charge of such machine or device will refund to any person money deposited by him for which the commodity or service promised expressly or impliedly has not been received, and it is hereby made the duty of such person to so refund such money.

"SEC. 11. That every peddler, hawker, street vendor, or other transient merchant shall deliver to every purchaser of any commodity of whatever kind, at the time of delivery of such commodity, a sales ticket which shall show the correct name, permanent address, and license number, if any, of the vendor, together with the weight, measure, or numerical count of each commodity sold to such purchaser. Every person, firm, or corporation having a fixed and established place of business shall, when a sales ticket is given with a purchase, cause such sales ticket to show the correct name and address of such person, firm, or corporation and the weight, measure, or numerical count, as the case may be, of each commodity sold to such purchaser, and every such person, firm, or corporation is hereby required to deliver such sales ticket to such purchaser when requested by such purchaser at the time of the sale to do so.

"SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful to sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia any coal, charcoal, or coke in any other manner than by weight. No person shall deliver or attempt to deliver any coal, charcoal, or coke without accompanying same by a delivery ticket and a duplicate thereof, on each of which shall be expressed distinctly in pounds, avoirdupois, in ink or other indelible substance, the gross weight of the load, the tare of the delivery vehicle or receptacle, and the net weight of coal, charcoal, or coke contained in the vehicle or receptacle used in making delivery, with the name of the purchaser and the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation from whom or which purchased. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors upon the person in charge of the vehicle of delivery, the original of these tickets shall be surrendered to the official making such demand. The duplicate ticket shall be delivered to the purchaser of said coal, charcoal, or coke, or to his agent or representative, at the time of delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors, or of the purchaser or intended purchaser, his agent or representative, the person delivering such coal, charcoal, or coke shall convey the same forthwith to some public scale, or to any legally approved private scale

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The first reading of the bill has been just completed. Is it proper now to have the committee amendments reported or should the amendments be reported as the bill is read for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there is to be general debate of one hour, the gentleman from Kentucky to control one half and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] the other.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I am informed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], who controls half of the time, that there is no request of him for any time, and there is none of me. However, I may state, in explanation of the bill, that it is a redraft of the present law covering some exigencies which have arisen since the passage of the original law. The main objects of the bill are to put scales under the supervision of the sealer of weights and measures, to see that they are properly inspected, and that no scales can be used for the purpose of selling goods, wares, or merchandise to the public until they have been found to be correct, and that hereafter they must be kept in proper weighing condition so that the public can not be cheated. In addition to that, a ton of coal is made 2,000 pounds instead of the original long ton of 2,240 pounds, and then the selling of ice is regulated by the bill. The sealer of weights and measures, if that be his official title—and of that I am not sure—informs me that at present those who sell ice refuse to weigh it. If you ask for a dime's worth of ice or 25 cents' worth they will hand you such a lump as they choose. If you ask that it be weighed in order to see that you are paying a reasonable price per pound, they will take back the piece of ice which they have proffered and drive off and will not give you any, and, under a seeming arrangement, the next day will not come around at all; and if complaint is made to the District authorities, the person who makes the complaint is blacklisted. Those are the three important features that are sought to be reached by this redraft of the old law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make an inquiry on one or two matters that are covered by the bill. First, as to the necessity of extending the scope of the inspection by the inspector of weights and measures to devices for weighing persons. I do not know whether there is any other city in the country where they have gone to the extent of providing for the inspection of scales for the weighing of persons, and yet we have such a provision in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would say to the gentleman if the scale does not properly weigh, the person who pays his money to be weighed is defrauded, and if the scale is not correct it should not stand on the street or in the storehouses and public places to invite the pennies of children and passers-by who desire to be weighed.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman I think in the section of country from which I come these penny-in-the-slot device scales are obliged to be sealed by the local sealers of weights and measures.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill goes further than that. It provides that none of these coin-in-the-slot machines shall be operated unless there is a person placed in charge of them. I do not believe——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Where is that?

Mr. STAFFORD. In section 10. I do not believe even in the very well-regulated district from which the gentleman from Massachusetts comes, where everything is orderly, everything is weighed according to precision, that they make that extreme limitation of not allowing a person to be weighed unless the weighing machine is in the charge of some person.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will pardon me, he will notice the language of the bill, in line 7, page 7, with reference to a vending device. Chewing gum, candy, and peanuts, and a whole lot of other things are sold out of automatic machines, and the gentleman will notice that the language "automatic vending device" is used also.

Mr. STAFFORD. The language is broader than that. While it extends to automatic vending devices, permit me to read the language:

> That no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained within the District of Columbia any coin-in-the-slot machine or automatic vending device without placing in charge thereof some responsible person.

Now, these weighing machines which we see about the public thoroughfares, and in the hotel corridors, drug stores, and other public places, are a great convenience. It is true sometimes they may not weigh accurately to the nicety of a pound, but nevertheless I do not think there should be the restriction that they should not be operated unless in the control of some responsible person.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I suggest to the gentleman that we wait until we read section 10 for amendment, and that the matter be brought up then, and perhaps it can be adjusted properly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Another question. I would like to inquire as to what is the prevailing ton for the sale of coal in the District. Is it the gross ton or the net ton?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is the long ton of 2,240 pounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why is the committee recommending it should be the short ton of 2,000 pounds?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In order to simplify matters. Many of the States have done the same thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. In many of the cities, without regulation, they use the short ton.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no regulation here about it, but the custom has been to use a long ton, and now it is proposed by legislative act to define what a ton of coal is, and that ton has been by this bill fixed at 2,000 pounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill goes very minutely into detail as to the regulation of all character of weights and measures for all character of commodities. I wish to inquire whether the committee used any statute existing in any municipality or in any State as a basis for the adoption of these weights and measures as prescribed in the various sections. For instance, we have here in section 19 the cubic content of liquid and dry containers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would say to the gentleman that the bill was prepared down at the Municipal Building by the man in charge of this department of the local government, and he informed us he got his figures from the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. DILLON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] rose first.

Mr. WALSH. Is it sought to legislate anybody out of office by this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. It does not legislate anybody out or in, or change any salary.

Mr. WALSH. What is the object of changing the title of "sealer" to "superintendent"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We asked the sealer of weights and measures, who appeared before the committee, and he just said he thought that name was better.

Mr. WALSH. It is a little more high-toned, probably, in his estimation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Perhaps so. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. But I think invariably in all jurisdictions the official who has charge of weights and measures is known as the "sealer of weights and measures," because he in most cases, or his assistants, have to test weighing and measuring devices and containers, and if they are found to be accurate he places the seal upon them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. His duties, however, both under the existing law and under this bill go further than that.

Mr. WALSH. I know they do; but he could perform them just as well if we did not change his title.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WALSH. Now, in section 19 the committee has set forth the cubic content of certain containers of liquids and also for dry measure. There has been a curious mixing up of fractions and decimals in that section. I suggest to the chairman the propriety of substituting words for the figures there. The gill contains 7.21875 cubic inches, and it is rather hard to tell at a glance whether it is millionths or hundredths of thousands of cubic inches.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is hundredths of thousands.

Mr. WALSH. It is more than hundredths of thousands.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will suggest to the gentleman that if he will submit an amendment the committee will consider it.

Mr. WALSH. I will admit that I am floundering when I am consulting such figures as that. If you write them out they would be much more easily comprehended. Now, in the next paragraph, on page 16, you have:

The standard bushel shall have a diameter of not less than 18½ inches, inside measurement, and shall contain 2,150.42 cubic inches.

Now, let me suggest to the gentleman, in the nature of an inquiry, whether there would be any objection to spelling those figures out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. None whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? What advantage would there be in spelling them out if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] does not know whether the decimal fraction is one hundred thousandths or millionths?

Mr. WALSH. I would be able to read the written words, but it takes some time to tell what the fraction is by reading the figures.

Mr. STAFFORD. If you did not know the value of the decimal point, it would still be accurate; but if you reduce it to words it might be inaccurate, according to the standard of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The poor housewife, going down to get a gallon of molasses, will not have much time to waste in order to find whether the gallon has 231 cubic inches or not; but for the sealer of weights and measures it would facilitate matters. Of course, they would not possess the keen mathematical intellect that is possessed by the gentleman from Wisconsin, who can immediately visualize the cubic content of these liquid and dry measures.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman should remember that I come from a liquid district.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. May I suggest that we leave it until we reach that section?

Mr. WALSH. I wanted to anticipate a little by asking the question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The committee would not object in the least to having those figures written out.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether or not the commissioners now have the authority to appoint public weighmasters?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They have.

Mr. WALSH. And there is no change in that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. None at all.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. If I remember correctly, we have by law established a standard barrel?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and this bill says that that standard shall be accepted here.

Mr. DILLON. How is it as to the standard cranberry barrel?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This refers to the cranberry barrel already established and accepts the barrel established by former acts of Congress.

Mr. DILLON. I think we have also established by law a standard berry basket. What does this bill propose with reference to that standard already fixed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not recall; and again I suggest that the gentleman wait until we get to that section of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895, is hereby amended to read as follows.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of line 3, page 1, I move to insert the word and figure "SECTION 1."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: At the beginning of the sentence, page 1, line 3, insert "SECTION 1."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it has never been the practice in the making up of bills to insert the words "SECTION 1," as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is in the committee report made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. STAFFORD. It has never been the practice of the House to insert the word "SECTION 1," because it is always considered that the first section is section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That there is hereby created an executive department in the government of the District of Columbia, which shall be known as the department of weights, measures, and markets. Such department shall be in charge of a superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, who shall be appointed by, and be under the direction and control of, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall receive a salary of $2,500 per annum. He shall have the custody and control of such standard weights and measures of the United States as are now or shall hereafter be provided by the District of Columbia, which shall be the only standards for weights and measures in said District.

The commissioners are also authorized to appoint, on the recommendation of the superintendent, such assistants, inspectors, and other employees for which Congress may, from time to time, provide.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 5, page 2, the word "superintendent" and insert the word "sealer."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Strike out, in line 5, page 2, the word "superintendent" and insert the word "sealer."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that the duties of this official, as prescribed in this act, are those of the sealer of weights and measures. That is a well-known office which is provided for in most cities and towns throughout most of the States, and there is nothing in this act to justify changing the title of that office. He is to perform practically the same duties that he had to perform under the law which this act seeks to amend, and I do not think it is a good practice, simply because we are going to enlarge or modify existing law, that we should change the designation of the official who is to perform the same character of duties that he has been performing heretofore.

I submit that while "superintendent" may possibly convey some satisfaction to the official himself that he is holding a more important office, the proper thing it seems to me to do is to just have him called "a sealer of weights and measures." Let him appoint his assistants and inspectors. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the same thing occurs in different parts of the bill. In order to avoid the votes upon them as they occur hereafter, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be directed to strike out the work "superintendent" wherever it occurs in a like sense in other parts of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the word "sealer."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that where the word "superintendent" appears in connection with the bill the Clerk be authorized to strike out the word and insert the word "sealer" in lieu thereof. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 1, page 2, the abbreviation "SEC. 2."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the reason why I offer that amendment is that this bill states in the lines right after the enacting clause that it is an amendment of "the act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1895." If this bill is framed with the purpose of being a substitute for that original enactment, when the codifiers would undertake a codification of the laws the first section would be that which is now described as "section 2," and would follow the enacting clause. Therefore I believe this amendment should be adopted, and then the other sections should be changed accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this is an executive department?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am sorry that I can not answer the gentleman advisedly. I am inclined to the opinion that it is.

Mr. WALSH. Has the District of Columbia got any legislative department?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think not.

Mr. WALSH. Then I do not think this is an executive department. I move to strike out the words in line 1, page 2, "an executive" and substitute "a," so that it will read "there is hereby created a department."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Strike out the words "an executive" and insert in lieu thereof the word "a."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman really think it should be a department? A "department" has a well-recognized meaning in the legislation of Congress. Of course, it will not be a bureau unless it would be connected with some department.

Mr. WALSH Replying to the gentleman, I think in a municipal government we would say that belonged to the department of the sealer of weights and measures. I think it is properly called a department of the District government, because the District government is framed on the same plan as that of municipalities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the superintendent shall, before entering upon the performance of his duties, give bond to the District of Columbia in the penal sum of $5,000, signed by two sureties or by a bonding company, to be approved by the commissioners, conditioned on the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation before the commissioners that he will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, which bond and oath shall be deposited with the commissioners.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figure "3" in line 17, page 2, and insert the figure "2."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to renumber all the subsequent sections to conform to the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to renumber the sections. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CONNALLY of Texas having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 8, 1918:

S. 3799. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

On June 10, 1918:

H. R. 9959. An act to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912; and

S. 1544. An act to provide for appeals from decisions of boards of local inspectors of vessels, and for other purposes.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the superintendent and under his direction his assistants and inspectors shall have exclusive power to perform all the duties provided in this act. They shall from time to time inspect, test, try, and ascertain whether or not they are correct all weights, scales, beams, measures of every kind, instruments, or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring, and all tools, appliances, or accessories connected with any or all such instruments or mechanical devices for weighing or measuring used or employed in the District of Columbia, by any owner, agent, lessee, or employee in determining the weight of persons and the weight, size, quality, extent, area, or measurement of quantities, things, produce, or articles of any kind offered for distribution, consumption, transportation, sale, barter, exchange, hire, or award, and shall seal, stamp, or mark, in the manner prescribed by the commissioners, such as conform to the standards kept in the office of the superintendent, and shall seize and destroy or mark, stamp, or tag with the word, "Condemned," such as do not conform to the standards, and shall also mark the date of such condemnation upon the same. Any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device of any kind which shall be found to be unsuitable for the purpose for which it is intended to be used or of defective construction or material shall be condemned. No person shall use or having the same under his control shall permit to be used for any of the purposes enumerated in this section any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device whatsoever unless the same has been approved in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any unapproved scale, weighing instrument, or non-portable measure or measuring device subject to inspection or test under the provisions of this act, shall notify the superintendent in writing at his office, giving a general description thereof, and the street and number or other location where same may be found, and it shall be the duty of the superintendent to cause the same to be inspected and tested within a reasonable time after receipt of such notice. Any person who shall acquire or have in his possession after the passage of this act any portable unapproved measure or measuring device, subject to inspection or test, shall cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection or test.

Every peddler, hawker, or other transient merchant shall, before using any such weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device, cause the same to be taken to the office of the superintendent for inspection or test semiannually, and shall not use any weight, scale, measure, weighing or measuring device which has not been approved within six months prior to the time of such use.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 3, lines 13 and 14, after the word "persons," insert "for a charge or compensation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 14, after the word "size," strike out the word "quality" and insert in lieu thereof the word "quantity."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 16, after the word "for," strike out the words "distribution, consumption."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 4, line 24, after the word "device," insert the words "for any of the purposes enumerated in this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 5, line 2, after the word "use," insert the words "for such purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is a typographical error in line 21, page 3, where the word "tag" has a superfluous "e" at the end of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That letter "e" should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to make the correction.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That no person shall neglect, fail, or refuse to exhibit any weight, scale, beam, measure, weighing or measuring device to the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors for the purpose of inspection and test, and no person shall in any manner obstruct, hinder, or molest the superintendent or any of his assistants, inspectors, or other employees in the performance of their duties.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 5, line 19, after the word "device," insert the words "subject to inspection or test under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That when any commodity is sold by weight it shall be understood to mean net weight. When any commodity, except coal, is sold by the ton it shall be understood to mean mean 2,000 pounds avoirdupois. Coal shall be sold by the long ton, consisting of 2,240 pounds avoirdupois.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 6, line 24, after the word "be," strike out the words "understood to mean."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 6, line 25, after the word "commodity," strike out the words "except coal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 6, line 25, and page 7, line 1, strike out the words "understood to mean mean."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 7, lines 1, 2, and 3, strike out the words "coal shall be sold by the long ton, consisting of 2,240 pounds avoirdupois."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained, within the District of Columbia any coin-in-the-slot machine or automatic vending device without placing in charge thereof some responsible person. No such machine shall be maintained for use when the same is not in perfect working order, and the person in charge as well as the owner of such machine or device shall be held responsible for operating or maintaining any such machine or device which is not in perfect working order. A sign or placard shall be placed on every such machine or device in a conspicuous place and shall contain the name of the owner and of the person in charge of such machine or device, and shall state that the person in charge of such machine or device will refund to any person money deposited by him for which the commodity or service promised expressly or impliedly has not been received, and it is hereby made the duty of such person to so refund such money.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is the section to which I directed attention in the general debate, as to the need of having an attendant in charge of all coin-in-the-slot machines. I think that regulation would be going rather to an extreme, and I question whether the language should not be modified in other particulars, so that these automatic vending devices will not be required to be in charge of some responsible person. I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and move to strike out the words in lines 6 and 7, "coin-in-the-slot machine or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 7, line 6, after the word "any," strike out the words "coin-in-the-slot machine or."

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Does this section mean that there may be one attendant to take care of two or more machines, or does it mean that for every machine there shall be an attendant? For instance, where there are half a dozen such machines, would it not be possible for one man to take care of all of them under this act?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe that the phraseology is broad enough so that there could be any number of machines in charge of one man.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. For instance, a man who had charge of a newspaper stand probably might be considered under the act as having charge of all the machines. It would not be necessary for him to stand by a machine every time some one put a nickel in the slot?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking to obviate the necessity of having an attendant at every weighing machine which we find so generally distributed not only on thoroughfares but in the hotel corridors and drug stores, and the like. As far as drug stores are concerned, they would be in charge of responsible persons, but if there was a weighing machine in the Union Depot terminal you could not say that that was in charge of a responsible person because some person would visit it once a day. Under this phraseology it would have to be within his purview.

Mr. PLATT. What is the use of having an automatic machine if you have to have a person in attendance on it?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Kentucky referred to automatic vending devices where you deposit a penny and get a penny's worth of salted peanuts, or deposit 5 cents or other amount and get a certain amount of merchandise. The intention was that these vending devices should be put in places where they were in the purview of some responsible person.

Mr. FOSTER. Would you make this apply to a person in charge of each one of these machines? Why not put one man in charge of a dozen and let him make the rounds?

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of the framers of this bill was to prohibit machines being placed in public places unless there be some person to supervise them. That may be going pretty far.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think the large assemblage on the Democratic side ought to be in order during the discussion of this important measure.

Mr. PLATT. If that provision should go into effect, you could not have a machine in many of these small railroad stations. Now, in the small way stations, what do we find. There are the vending machines, and they are within the purview of the ticket agent.

Mr. GILLETT. What if they are not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If we find a machine that is cheating the people, there ought to be somebody responsible to look after it.

Mr. PLATT. I think the large part of the provision about having the name of the owner on it is all right, but to place it in charge of some responsible person is too broad and liable to be misconstrued.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is about the only protection you can give the public.

Mr. PLATT. The public is not complaining about the machines to any considerable extent that I have heard of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The sealer of weights and measures says that there is a good deal of complaint about their weight.

Mr. PLATT. They are all over the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps the gentleman has not used them to any great extent, and neither have I, but I have known circumstances where they have refused to deliver the goods.

Mr. PLATT. I have known some elaborate machines. I know a machine where you put your hand in a glove and make a choice of cigars, and that has worked pretty well, but I admit that there ought to be the name of the owner on the machine.

Mr. STAFFORD. They ought to be in charge of some person, where you could seek reimbursement in case the machine refuses to work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say that only recently I dropped a 25-cent piece into a machine to get a bottle of listerine and did not get anything, and I could not find anybody in charge or who was responsible.

Mr. PLATT. I never heard of listerine being sold by vending machines.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; they sell toothbrushes and all sorts of things in these slot machines.

Mr. PLATT. They ought to have something on them as to who the owner is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They should have some one to whom they could go for reimbursement if the machine does not work. They have a lot of things which sell for as much as a half a dollar.

Mr. PLATT. The very purpose of an automatic machine is to get rid of having anybody to do the work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This will compel the owner of the machines to keep them in working order.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me that in these days, when labor is scarce, the use of these machines ought to be encouraged.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They ought not to be encouraged to cheat people.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin I think perhaps the idea he has in mind is worthy of consideration. But I think the amendment ought to be recast so as to provide that none of these machines should be set up and maintained except in places or on premises in charge of some responsible person.

If you put a machine in a drug store, I do not think the proprietor ought to be obliged to put a man in charge of the machine. But I think the company or the person who owns the machine ought not to be permitted to put it up on premises where nobody is in charge of the premises. So I think the gentleman from Wisconsin can very easily redraft his amendment so that it will provide that no person, firm, or corporation shall erect, operate, or maintain, or cause to be erected, operated, or maintained within the District of Columbia any coin-slot machine or automatic vending device except upon premises in charge of some responsible person.

It seems to me that that would obviate the objections that have been raised here. If it is agreeable to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I would like to offer that as a substitute.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was seeking to except those weighing machines that are placed on public thoroughfares not in charge of any person.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman means on the sidewalks, but they could be placed up against the wall in charge of some person.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think the construction would go to that extent. I think the automatic vending devices should have an attendant on the premises; that they should be in charge of some responsible person. If it is desired to withdraw the weighing machines in the streets and thoroughfares and have them only on premises in charge of some person, I am not going to be insistent on my amendment.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, now that we have restored order on the Democratic side, I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Wisconsin will come to an agreement and heal the breach in the Republican Party over there. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment in view of the harmony prevailing across the aisle, but I notice that that harmony began immediately on the entrance of the gentleman from South Carolina, who has just taken his seat. I offer this as a substitute: In line 7, after the word "device," strike out the words "without placing" and insert the words "except upon thep remises." So that it will read: "any coin-in-the-slot machine for automatic vending device except upon premises in charge of some responsible person."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts right there that the most expensive articles sold from these machines are in hotels, not in the office of the hotels but in the rooms.

Mr. WALSH. They are in the premises in charge of somebody.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They are, but they are not carefully looked after. However, I do not care.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 7, after the word "device," strike out the words "without placing" and in lieu thereof insert the words "except upon premises."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that that is offered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that it is a substitute. It is a separate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be first in order.

Mr. WALSH. I offer it as a substitute, and I should like to be advised why it can not be considered as a substitute, if the gentleman from Wisconsin raises the point.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts in nowise is related to the amendment that I presented. I offered an amendment to strike out. That may be voted up or voted down. If it is voted up or down, then it will be in order for the gentleman to move to strike out and to insert, as is provided for in his amendment. His amendment is entirely distinct and separate and there is no direct relation to the amendment that I have offered. The committee might wish to vote to strike out the words that I have suggested to be stricken out and yet might also be willing to incorporate the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It has no direct relation to it and is therefore not a substitute, but is a separate and distinct amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 6, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it is possible to get tellers without causing serious embarrassment, so I shall not ask for them. I now move to amend the section by striking out, in line 7, page 7, the words "without placing" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "except in or upon premises."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 7, after the word "device," strike out the words "without placing" and insert in lieu thereof the words "except in or upon premises."

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts it deals with the control of premises, whereas this bill's purpose is to control a machine. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as I understand it, provides that the machine shall not be placed except upon premises which are under the control of a responsible party, but his amendment carries no control over the machine. That is the reason why I think the amendment ought to be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 7, noes 6.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That every peddler, hawker, street vendor, or other transient merchant shall deliver to every purchaser of any commodity of whatever kind, at the time of delivery of such commodity, a sales ticket which shall show the correct name, permanent address, and license number, if any, of the vendor, together with the weight, measures, or numerical count of each commodity sold to such purchaser. Every person, firm, or corporation having a fixed and established place of business shall, when a sales ticket is given with a purchase, cause such sales ticket to show the correct name and address of such person, firm, or corporation and the weight, measure, or numerical count, as the case may be, of each commodity sold to such purchaser, and every such person, firm, or corporation is hereby required to deliver such sales ticket to such purchaser when requested by such purchaser at the time of the sale to do so.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

Page 7, line 23, after the word "or," strike out the word "other."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is this. The several classes of peddlers, and so forth, enumerated, as the language stands, are all to be considered as transient. The general meaning of the word "transient" would be persons who do not live in the District or who do not customarily do business in the District, but who are doing business here temporarily. That is certainly not the purpose with respect to "every peddler, hawker, street vendor," and by striking out the word "other" I think the meaning of the committee would be made plain.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move now to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the section under consideration requires in the purchase of every character of merchandise within the purview of this act that there shall be furnished by the vendor, whether he is a peddler, hawker, street vendor, or other transient merchant, or whether he has a permanent place of business, a sales ticket giving the amount of the purchase, the name, permanent address, and license number of the vendor in case he is an itinerant or transient merchant, and also the statement of the weight, measure, and numerical count of each commodity sold to the purchaser.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What would that result in on a busy day down here in any stall in the market or in a drug store on Pennsylvania Avenue or F Street at any time you might drop in there?

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not only cause tremendous delay, but it would cause disorganization, and would absolutely prevent the transaction of business in the ordinary methods in which retail business is conducted not only in the District of Columbia but in any other place.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] would hardly apply, as this section refers to sales on streets and not in market stalls.

Mr. STAFFORD. This section extends to all sales——

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me direct the gentleman's attention and I think I can convince him I am right on that proposition. The first sentence of the section relates to the itinerant or transient merchant. We are in accord on that. Then I direct the gentleman's attention to the language beginning with the word "every," in line 3, which is as follows:

Every person, firm, or corporation having a fixed and established place of business shall, when a sales ticket is given with a purchase, cause such sales ticket to show the correct name and address of such person, firm, or corporation and the weight, measure, or numerical count, as the case may be, of each commodity sold to such purchaser, and every such person, firm, or corporation is hereby required to deliver such sales ticket to such purchaser when requested by such purchaser at the time of the sale to do so.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman will note that as to the sale upon the street it is compulsory that a ticket be given, even if you get a dozen bananas. I do not think it should be compulsory, but the second part is that the ticket must be given if the customer requests it. If he goes in and gets a tooth brush, naturally he will not ask for a ticket as to a certain weight or count, but if he goes in and gets a bushel or a barrel of potatoes he will perhaps request a certificate, a slip, and if he does certainly it ought to be furnished, but in nine sales out of ten there will not be any request.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with these so-called hawkers or venders who go about the streets in the poor and middle-class districts of Washington distributing truck, as we call it, and all kinds of edible fresh market goods to the dwellers of the District, and I do not believe that they should be hampered as this section provides in the operation of their business. Every one of us here knows what they do in the sale of their merchandise. There is not much criticism of the way they do business.

All this measure under consideration should do is that the sealer of weights and measures should see that they have proper standards in use and that is the rule that is adopted in nearly every municipality, to have proper standards of measurement, and then the sealers with their inspectors will go around and see that they use the proper measure in the sale of their truck goods. If the seller shall be required to give a slip with the name and license number and enumerate all the purchases that are made by the housewives of this District, it will place a ban upon the housewives in having the advantage of competition in purchases of truck from these itinerant vendors.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman interpret this to mean that every boy who peddles or sells a newspaper must be obliged to give a ticket?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; not a newspaper. This bill does not extend to the sale of newspapers.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It says "peddler"; it says "vendor," which certainly would seem to extend to sales of newspapers.

Mr. PLATT. Why does it not?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would say that would be construed to mean only those articles which would be covered by the character of measurements which are included in this bill.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. There are two or three hundred things that can be——

Mr. PLATT. When they sell one newspaper would they have to put it down one newspaper?

Mr. STAFFORD. If it would bear that very extreme construction, then it is one argument further why the whole section should be eliminated. It is out of keeping with the idea of the bill. This bill is to provide correct standards, so that a person who purchases their wares shall get full value. We prescribe the size of the berry box, and no peddler or merchant will be able to sell berries unless the containers are as prescribed here.

Mr. CARLIN. Has the gentleman an amendment pending to strike out this provision?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does the gentleman think that beginning in line 3 with the word "every" that the rest of the section shall be kept in? That does not deal with the matter the gentleman has been discussing, but it deals with the right of the purchaser to procure a slip upon his request.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think we should be unduly burdening the retail merchants of this District in this matter. We are going a great way when we are providing standards under this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Most of the transient merchants are not doing a very large business.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 22, after the word "that," insert "upon the request of such purchaser."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is simply to make the first portion of the section not compulsory unless the purchaser desires such slip, which of course he would not desire in the case of a newspaper or a cigar, or anything of that kind, but if he bought a quantity of fish or vegetables or fruit he might desire it, and if he desires it he ought to be entitled to it. Therefore I have offered that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that the suggestion was made in the committee that ofttimes this is a protection to servants who are sent out with a piece of money to buy, say, 50 cents worth of tomatoes or something of that sort, and the servant would get a slip showing how much had been obtained for that piece of money.

Mr. CRAMTON. If you make it optional with the purchaser you will obviate the most of the hardships of which the gentleman from Wisconsin complains.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Under the gentleman's amendment every vendor would always have to carry a slip in his pocket. If you demand a slip and he does not have it, he would be liable to punishment.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is not a hardship to carry a blank pad or a few slips in the pocket, to be given out when the vendor is asked for them.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair may have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], the Chair thinks his amendment is out of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a preferential amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a preferential amendment to perfect the section before the amendment to strike out is voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, then, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to strike out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe an arrangement has already been made to correct the numbering of the sections. Section 11 having gone out, the next section will be 11 instead of 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That it shall be unlawful to sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia any coal, charcoal, or coke in any other manner than by weight. No person shall deliver or attempt to deliver any coal, charcoal, or coke without accompanying same by a delivery ticket and a duplicate thereof, on each of which shall be expressed distinctly in pounds, avoirdupois, in ink or other indelible substance, the gross weight of the load, the tare of the delivery vehicle or receptacle, and the net weight of coal, charcoal, or coke contained in the vehicle or receptacle used in making delivery, with the name of the purchaser and the name and address of the person, firm, or corporation from whom or which purchased. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors upon the person in charge of the vehicle of delivery, the original of these tickets shall be surrendered to the official making such demand. The duplicate ticket shall be delivered to the purchaser of said coal, charcoal, or coke, or to his agent or representative, at the time of delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke. Upon demand of the superintendent or any of his assistants or inspectors, or of the purchaser or intended purchaser, his agent or representative, the person delivering such coal, charcoal, or coke shall convey the same forthwith to some public scale, or to any legally approved private scale in the District of Columbia, the owner of which shall consent to its use and shall permit the verifying of the weight, and after the delivery of such coal, charcoal, or coke shall return forthwith with the wagon or other conveyance used to the same scale and permit to be verified the weight of the wagon or other conveyance: Provided, That when coal, charcoal, or coke is sold in a quantity less than 280 pounds and is not weighed in a wagon, cart, or other vehicle, it shall be sufficient for the seller to deliver to the purchaser, his agent, or representative a ticket showing the name and address of the vendor, the name of the purchaser, and the true net weight of the coal, charcoal, or coke so sold or delivered: Provided further, That when coal, charcoal, or coke is sold in packages of 50 pounds or less, it shall be sufficient to plainly mark each package with the name of the person, firm, or corporation making such package, and the true net weight of the coal, charcoal, or coke contained therein.

No coal, charcoal, or coke shall be sold which contains more water or other liquid substance than is due to the natural condition of the coal, charcoal, or coke at the time the weight is taken.

Every vendor of coal, charcoal, or coke shall cause his name to be conspicuously displayed on both sides of each vehicle used by or for him for the delivery of coal, charcoal, or coke.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I notice in the proviso on page 9, lines 18 and 19, that the committee has fixed 280 pounds as a maximum whereby coal must be marked when sold in packages. I do not know whether there is any relation in what I am about to say, but 280 pounds is one-eighth of a gross ton of coal. The committee by an amendment has changed the ton of coal from the large ton of 2,240 to 2,000 pounds. Now, I wish to inquire whether the chairman wishes to adhere to 280 or wishes to take the smaller amount, of one-eighth of 2,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think that should be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "eighty" in line 19 and insert "fifty," so as to make this amount conform to one-eighth of the small ton.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 9, line 19, strike out the word "eighty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk has just invited my attention to the fact that I made an inaccurate statement a few moments ago relative to the renumbering of the sections. In order that there may be no further confusion about it or no further requests necessary, I now ask unanimous consent that at the completion of the bill the Clerk may properly number each section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular, so as to have the Clerk advised? Perhaps the present reading clerk was not here when the motion was made to strike out the designation of "SEC. 2," at the beginning of page 2. Then a motion was made, which was adopted, that the Clerk be authorized to renumber all the subsequent sections to conform to that amendment. So section 3 will be section 2, and the other sections, according to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, will be numbered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the reading of the bill the Clerk be authorized to renumber the sections.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In conformity with the amendment made heretofore by the gentleman from Wisconsin or which may hereafter be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to an improper spelling in line 21. The word "receptable" should be "receptacle."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On what page?

The CHAIRMAN. On page 8.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk be directed to correct the spelling.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will be directed to correct the spelling of that word.

There was no objection.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 8, line 19, after the word "avoirdupois," insert the words: "the original of which shall be."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the standard loaf of bread manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in the District of Columbia shall weigh 1 pound avoirdupois, but bread may also be manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in loaves of one-half pound, or in multiples of 1 pound, but shall not be manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in other than the aforenamed weights. Every loaf of bread manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in the District of Columbia shall have affixed thereon, in a conspicuous place, a label at least 1 inch square, or, if round, at least 1 inch in diameter, upon which label there shall be printed in plain bold-face gothic type, not smaller than 12 point, the letters and figures of which shall be printed in black ink upon white paper, the weight of the loaf in fraction of a pound, pound, or pounds, as the case may be, whether the loaf be a standard loaf or not. The business name and address of the maker, baker, or manufacturer of the loaf shall also be plainly printed on each such label. Every seller of bread in the District of Columbia shall keep a scale which shall have been inspected and approved in accordance with the provisions of this act, suitable for weighing bread, in a conspicuous place in his bakery, bakeshop, or store, or other place where he is engaged in the sale of bread, and shall, whenever requested by the buyer, and in the presence of the buyer, weigh the loaf or loaves of bread sold or offered for sale.

Nothing herein shall apply to crackers, pretzels, buns, rolls, scones, or loaves of fancy bread weighing less than one-fourth of 1 pound avoirdupois, or to what is commonly known as stale bread, sold as such, provided the seller shall, at the time the sale is made, expressly state to the buyer that the bread so sold is stale bread: Provided, That any loaf of bread weighing within 10 per cent in excess or within 4 per cent less than standard weight shall be deemed of legal weight.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I would like to know how this label, of at least 1 inch in diameter, upon which there should be printed in plain bold-face Gothic type, and so forth, the weight of the loaf, is going to be affixed to the loaf of bread. Is it going to be pasted on by somebody licking the label? If so, I object to having microbes of that kind put on my bread.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It will be done with a brush and paste.

Mr. PLATT. I know they do that with some bread; but sometimes they lick the labels, and I think it ought to be stopped.

Mr. SUMNERS. It is a waste of bread, too.

Mr. PLATT. Labels never ought to be allowed to be put on a loaf of bread at any time. It is not necessary to label a loaf of bread. It ought not to be allowed. The Board of Health ought to object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] offer an amendment?

Mr. PLATT. I would like to move to strike it out.

Mr. STAFFORD. While the gentleman is preparing his amendment, Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition. There is a minor matter to which I wish to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee in the proviso at the end of the section on page 12, where it is stated that any loaf of bread weighing within 10 per cent in excess or within 4 per cent less than standard weight shall be deemed of legal weight.

I assume that the gentleman really has no objection if the loaf of bread is in excess of the 10 per cent, and so I suggest that we strike out the words "within 10 per cent," so that the proviso should read "that any loaf of bread weighing in excess of the standard weight or within 4 per cent less than the standard weight." I offer the following amendment: Strike out the words "within 10 per cent" in line 10, page 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 12, line 10, after the word "weighing," strike out the words "within 10 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Strike out, on page 11, lines 10 to 21, including the first word on line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 11, lines 10 to 21, strike out the following: "Every loaf of bread manufactured for sale, sold, offered or exposed for sale in the District of Columbia shall have affixed thereon in a conspicuous place a label at least 1 inch square, or, if round, at least 1 inch in diameter, upon which label there shall be printed in plain bold-face Gothic type, not smaller than 12 point, the letters and figures of which shall be printed in black ink upon white paper the weight of the loaf in fraction of a pound, pound, or pounds, as the case may be, whether the loaf be a standard loaf or not. The business name and address of the maker, baker, or manufacturer of the loaf shall also be plainly printed on each such label."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That the standard barrel for fruits, vegetables, and other dry commodities other than cranberries and the standard barrel for cranberries in the District of Columbia shall be the same as is provided in the act of Congress approved March 4, 1915, entitled "An act to fix the standard barrel for fruits, vegetables, and other dry commodities."

The standard box or crate for apples, pears, plums, peaches, tomatoes, turnips, and other fruits and vegetables not secondarily contained in quart or other boxes within such box or crate shall have an interior capacity of not less than 2,352 cubic inches.

A bushel crate for cranberries or blueberries shall have an interior capacity of 2,150.42 cubic inches.

All sales of blackberries, strawberries, blueberries, gooseberries, currants, raspberries, cherries, lima beans, shelled peas, and other berries and vegetables of approximately like size, in quantities of less than 1 bushel, shall be by the peck, quart, pint, or half pint standard dry measure, and all berry boxes or baskets used, sold, or offered for sale in the District of Columbia shall be of the interior capacity of not less than 1 quart, 1 pint, or one-half pint standard dry measure.

Standard containers for the sale of fresh fruits and vegetables in quantities of less than 1 bushel shall be of the capacity of 1 quart, 2 quarts, 3 quarts, 4 quarts, 5 quarts, 6 quarts, 8 quarts, 16 quarts, or 24 quarts standard dry measure, and such containers shall contain the full capacity of such fresh fruits or vegetables when such fresh fruits or vegetables are sold or offered for sale. When fresh fruits or vegetables are sold in other than standard containers such containers shall be plainly and conspicuously marked in the English language in Gothic type at least 24 points high with the true net weight, measure, or numerical count of such fresh fruits or vegetables.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 13, line 4, after the words "cranberries and," insert the words "lime and."

Mr. CRAMTON. The purpose of the amendment is properly to observe the Federal law with reference to the standard recently passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Now, I have a second amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 13, line 9, after the word "commodities," strike out the period and insert the following: "And the standard barrels for lime shall be the same as that provided in the act of Congress approved August 23, 1916, entitled 'An act to standardize lime barrels.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That a barrel of flour shall contain 196 pounds avoirdupois, net weight, and fractional parts thereof shall contain proportionate net weight.

A cord of wood shall contain 128 cubic feet; when wood is sold by the cord, it shall, when delivered, contain 128 cubic feet, whether sawed and split or not.

A standard sack or bag of potatoes shall contain 1½ bushels of potatoes, standard dry measure, and potatoes shall not be sold by the sack or bag in other than standard sacks or bags.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] a question with reference to that language about the measurement of wood. I had a little experience with a very prominent concern here last winter who took very great umbrage because when I paid $18 a cord for wood and could buy only one-fourth of a cord it was about one-third shy of that amount. Their defense was that there was some regulation in the District that when you buy a fraction of a cord of wood, instead of piling it up as you would naturally do, they throw it into a box and you take what you get. In my case I paid from $25 to $30 a cord for wood, and a very prominent firm of coal dealers were very much insulted when I insisted on full measure. I want to know if this phrase will prevent such little disputes as I had with that firm last winter. It says, "When wood is sold by the cord, it shall, when delivered, contain 128 cubic feet, whether sawed and split or not." Does that mean that all wood sold in quantities shall be piled up and measured as it is proper to measure wood, or whether it is possible for them to throw it into a box of more or less obscure dimensions and give you the result?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Without that part of the bill there is already a clause in a bill here defining what a cord should be.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is what I ran up against.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A quarter of a cord is a quarter of a cord. If they did not give you a full quarter, they cheated you. But there are penalties imposed in this bill for failure to comply with the provisions.

Mr. CRAMTON. They insisted that they were not guilty of cheating, but that I was guilty of lese majeste for calling attention to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me in order that I may make a suggestion based on some practical experience, not with wood, but with other things?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Take stone, for example. If you take a solid block of stone and will measure a yard, 27 cubic feet, it would weigh 4,860 pounds when it is dense in one block. You can take that same quantity of stone and crush it up and pile it wherever you want to pile it, in a box or in a frame, and the interstices between the small fractions of the stone will be such as to make a cubic yard of stone weigh only 2,500 pounds. Now, I assume that in measuring wood 128 cubic feet of wood would be a cord if it were piled up in lengths where there would be but few interstices, and that 128 cubic feet of wood would not be a cord if it were piled up and cut into small pieces. There would not be so much wood.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the old law a cord of wood measured 8 feet long, 4 feet high, and 4 feet wide.

Mr. MADDEN. But if you split it up you would not get as much wood if you had 128 cubic feet as if you had it in big logs.

Mr. CRAMTON. To make it perfectly clear, I want to offer an amendment and insert this language, "and shall not be measured by loose piling in a box."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Why not say "measured in the same way that a cord would be measured"?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 13, line 12, strike out the period and insert the following: "and shall not be measured by loose piling in a receptacle."

Mr. CRAMTON. And to be considered as a part of the same amendment, in line 10, after the word "cord," insert the words "or fraction thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 10, after the word "cord," insert the words "or fraction thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment consisting of the two paragraphs which have been read by the Clerk.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I will offer the words to come at the close of the paragraph, and omit the reference to the fraction of a cord, which makes some complications, and which is unnecessary anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, then, the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Pages 13, line 12, at the end of the sentence strike out the period and insert the following: "and shall not be measured by loose piling in a receptable."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I am in favor of this amendment or not, as I am not very familiar with the methods used for the sale of wood in the District of Columbit; but I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan, who proposes this amendment, how he intends to have a quarter of a cord of wood measured? How are they going to measure sawed and split kindling wood? Have they got to measure it before they saw and split it?

Mr. CRAMTON. Why, Mr. Chairman, when a customer calls up a wood yard and asks for a cord of wood, and is told he can not buy more than a quarter of a cord, and he is paying $18 a cord, I want the law so framed that he will get a quarter of 128 cubic feet of wood properly piled. It is up to the wood yard whether they will measure that wood before they split it into kindling wood or not; but I want the customer to get the wood that he pays for instead of getting about half or two-thirds of what he pays for.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman want 32 cubic feet of wood sawed and split or does he want 32 feet of sawed and split wood? For instance, you may take 32 feet of wood and have it sawed and split, and then measure it, and it will contain more than 32 cubic feet.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not come from near enough Boston to be able to make that distinction.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know the purpose of this amendment, because I should like to know how they are going to measure a quarter of a cord of sawed and split wood unless they throw it into some sort of a box or receptacle.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York, who, I know, can answer that question.

Mr. PLATT. The common practice or custom of dealers in wood, who sell wood in small quantities and who sell kindling wood split in fine pieces, perhaps a foot long, is by the bushel basket.

Mr. WALSH. That is the way they sell it up in the wilderness where I reside.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, when you buy kindling wood by the basket you are not buying wood by the cord, and this language applies only when wood is sold by the cord. If it is a bushel basket of kindling which you are buying, that is one thing, but when you are buying wood by the cord, it should contain a certain amount.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. Why not insert after the word "feet," in line 11, the words "or some multiple thereof"? That would make 128 feet the basis of a cord of wood.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is after a fraction of a cord.

Mr. CRAMTON. It says "by the cord." Now, whether you buy half a cord——

Mr. COX. Or a quarter of a cord——

Mr. CRAMTON. The standard measure is 128 feet.

Mr. COX. Yes; that is your basis of measure. Now, why not put in there some multiple of that?

Mr. CRAMTON. What I am seeking is to have them pile it properly instead of throwing it in loosely.

Mr. COX. If you measure out 128 cubic feet you get a cord of wood.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in the short time at my disposal, I wish to express my opposition to this amendment. If the gentleman buys a quarter of a cord of wood, when we provide by statute that a full cord shall contain 128 cubic feet, how can the gentleman object to the method of measurement if he gets 32 cubic feet in his quarter of a cord? It seems to me the gentleman ought not to limit the method of ascertaining the number of cubic feet in the quantity which he orders by providing that it can not be measured in a receptacle or box. I am of the impression that some wood dealers have a box which is built to contain a quarter of a cord of wood, and that wood is thrown in there, and when the box is filled it contains 32 cubic feet. On the other hand, if the gentleman does as some of us do who occasionally buy a quarter or half a cord of wood, sawing and splitting it ourselves—if you buy a quarter of a cord of wood in the 4-foot length and then saw and split it and attempt to pile it up and measure it, you find you have more than 32 cubic feet.

I trust the amendment may be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the chairman of the committee, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD very briefly upon the subject of the child-labor law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the child-labor law. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman if his desire to extend his remarks has anything to do with this being the forty-fifth anniversary of his wedding?

Mr. MASON. Nothing whatever; that is a mere coincidence.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, when section 9 was under consideration, which changes the standard ton from the long ton to a ton of 2,000 pounds, I failed to inquire if that was adopted, the users of coal in the District would not receive 240 pounds less coal and still pay the standard price fixed by the Fuel Administration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I do not think so, the same change has been made in many States, was made in my own State, and everybody soon learned the difference between the long ton of 2,240 pounds and a ton of 2,000 pounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; they learn the difference that they get less coal, but they do not get a difference in price.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have known instances where it has not affected the price. The question is whether there is going to be a corresponding reduction in price.

Mr. WALDOW. The Fuel Administration says it is going to watch it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Fuel Administration has a good deal to watch and I hope they will not overlook the fact that the users of coal are not going to get so large a ton as they formerly had.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Wisconsin was thoroughly thrashed out in committee, and we thought the public was sufficiently wise to protect itself in that respect.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A standard sack or bag of potatoes shall contain 1½ bushels of potatoes, standard dry measure, and potatoes shall not be sold by the sack or bag in other than standard sacks or bags."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the reason for that is that potatoes are now shipped into Washington from Michigan, where we get the best potatoes that come into Washington, under a Federal regulation as to grading, and so forth. I am very sure they are shipped in 150-pound sacks. I know of no good reason why that traffic in potatoes should be interfered with as it would be by this provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. All of the early potatoes come from the South, and they come from different sections and different localities and in different kinds of sacks and bags.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have been buying potatoes all winter at the commission houses and I have bought none except in 150-pound sacks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is in the winter time, but I am speaking of the early potatoes that we get from the South.

Mr. CRAMTON. I see no good reason why we should interfere with an existing traffic. A hundred-and-fifty-pound sack is a good-sized sack and not too large. If we adopt this provision, they can only be sold in 90-pound sacks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It says if sold by the sack or bag. It is a great protection.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is no protection to the customer. When they come from Michigan they have a tag on them, "United States, No. 1," and there is 150 pounds in a bag, and people know what they are getting. If you put this provision in, it simply means that the commission house must cease buying Michigan potatoes, and also of any other State that ships them in sacks of 150 pounds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; just the opposite.

Mr. CRAMTON. Perhaps the gentleman can explain it. The language is:

A standard sack or bag of potatoes shall contain 1½ bushels of potatoes, standard dry measure, and potatoes shall not be sold by the sack or bag in other than standard sacks or bags.

They can only be sold in sacks of 90 pounds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Where does the gentleman get his 90 pounds?

Mr. CRAMTON. A sack of 1½ bushels.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A sack contains 1½ bushels.

Mr. CRAMTON. Your bill says a standard sack shall contain 1½ bushels—that is, 90 pounds. Our Michigan potatoes—and I think potatoes generally—are sold in sacks containing 2½ bushels, or 150 pounds.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will yield, it is my understanding that under the ruling of the Food Administration all potatoes are sold by the pound, and they no longer figure on selling potatoes on a bushel basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman should know that this is a copy of the present law.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a law more honored in the breach than in the observance, and ought not to be continued.

Mr. BLACK. The Food Administration has changed the whole method of selling potatoes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is only a temporary change.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know how long it will last, but I know that all potatoes are sold by the wholesale trade simply upon the weight basis.

Mr. CRAMTON. We ought not to adopt a law here that is going to prevent potatoes in the ordinary course of trade coming into Washington in accordance with the ordinary trade customs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That the standard liquid gallon shall contain 231 cubic inches; the half gallon, 115.5 cubic inches; the quart, 57.75 cubic inches; the pint, 28.875 cubic inches; the half pint, 14.4375 cubic inches; the gill, 7.21875 cubic inches; the fluid ounce, 1.8047 cubic inches; and no liquid measure ot other than the foregoing capacity, except multiples of the gallon, shall be deemed legal liquid measure in the District of Columbia.

Every dry measure in use in the District of Columbia shall be cylindrical in design. The standard bushel shall have a diameter of not less than 15½ inches inside measurement, and shall contain 2,150.42 cubic inches; the half bushel shall have a diameter of not less than 13½ inches inside measurement, and shall contain 1,075.21 cubic inches inside measurement; the peck shall have a diameter of not less than 10¾ inches inside measurement, and shall contain 537.605 cubic inches; the half peck shall have a diameter of not less than 8½ inches inside measurement, and shall contain 268.8025 cubic inches; the quarter peck shall have a diameter of not less than 6½ inches inside measurement, and shall contain 134.40125 cubic inches; the quart shall have a diameter of not less than 5½ inches inside measurement, and shall contain 67.2 cubic inches; the pint shall have a diameter of not less than 4 inches inside measurement, and shall contain 33.6 cubic inches; the half pint shall have a diameter of not less than 3 inches inside measurement, and shall contain 16.8 cubic inches; and no dry measure of other than the foregoing capacities, except multiples of the bushel, shall be a legal dry measure in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to dry measures which have heretofore been tested and approved in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in the previous sections of the bill the decimal fractions, instead of being expressed in numerals, as in the section just read, have been expressed in words, printed out; and, with the consent of the chairman of the committee, I ask unanimous consent that all of the numerals expressing content measure in this section be expressed by the printed words, and that the numerals be eliminated, that change to be made by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. That refers not only to the decimals but to all numerals as well?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all numerals in this section be eliminated, and that the content measures referred to therein be expressed in printed words. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 24, insert a new section as follows:
Nothing in this act shall be construed as preventing any dealer from selling goods by the weights and measures known as the metric system: Provided, That, if used, this system must be used exclusively by the said dealer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, the metric system is well known to all of our youngsters who are now in school, and has for some years been taught in our schools. It is the system that is in use in almost all European countries, and it seems to me that we ought not to pass an act which would prevent its being used here. It has certain conveniences over our present system which every one recognizes who knows about it, and I think that we at least ought to permit it here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this would ball up the whole business, and I therefore insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which prescribes standards, and here is a standard of weights and measures which is known to all of the world. The Army and Navy use the metric system. If you go to any of the cantonments you will find maps are made in meters. Other departments of the Government also use it, and surely we ought not to prohibit dealers in the District of Columbia, the seat of Government of this great Nation, from selling their goods by a standard of weights and measures which is fixed and needs no special law, a decimal system which is very easy to reckon by to anyone who cares to look into it, and which is in use in nearly all great countries except the United States and England. I do not see how it can possibly be out of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged a word on the point of order, this legislation is intended to provide for the appointment of a sealer of weights and measures and to fix certain definite standards. It certainly is not in order, after we have fixed a certain definite standard, to provide that certain other methods may be used, and that we shall legalize some other method that has not been standardized; and that is just what the amendment of the gentleman from New York does.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman would surely not say that the metric system has not been standardized.

Mr. GOULD. It has not been adopted in this country.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, yes; it has.

Mr. WALSH. It is not legalized nor is it standardized by any legislation in this country. It may be the standard in Germany. I understand that it is.

Mr. PLATT. I think if the gentleman will look into our State laws he will find that the metric system has been authorized by some of the States, and also by some Federal statutes.

Mr. WALSH. The fact that it has been established by some of the States has no bearing upon this. This is a law passed by Congress, and you can not insert an amendment in this bill which recognizes the cubic standard measures and the other standards that are specified here, and by that amendment make some other system entirely distinct a standard. You can not do that by simply putting in a blanket amendment and saying that nothing in this bill which requires a commodity to be sold or disposed of in accordance with its provisions shall prevent its being sold or disposed of by some other system. We would simply be legalizing a system that is not standardized by this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York had offered in the respective paragraphs of this bill the alternative of measurement, instead of the fixed measurement as prescribed in the bill—in words, "or that prescribed by the metric system"—I do not think that any gentleman would contend that it would not have been in order, because this House has the right in determining the character of standard measurement that shall be fixed in this District to say that certain standards shall contain a certain number of cubic inches content, or a standard containing a content based on the metric system, or both. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], a very learned parliamentarian, has held that if a general amendment is offered that seeks to accomplish what could be accomplished by separate amendments to the bill, it is in order. The only purpose of the gentleman's amendment is that instead of offering seriatim individual amendments to all the provisions of the bill saying that the standard of measurement shall be such and such, or that based upon the metric system, he offers an amendment of a general character that says that nothing in this act shall be construed as preventing any dealer from selling goods by weights and measures known as the metric system, and therefore the amendment virtually says that there shall be a standard of measurement——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). In addition to that prescribed in the bill known generally as the metric system. Now, I am not in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman, but nevertheless I contend as we are legislating on the question of standards of all characters, dry and liquid, that the gentleman from New York is in order when he offers a general amendment permissive in its character saying that the weights and measures shall be that based on the metric system. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that the gentleman is familiar with section 8 of a document that heretofore we have been wont to hold in some respect and esteem, namely, the Constitution of the United States, giving Congress authority to coin money, and so forth, and to fix the standard of weights and measures. Now, does the gentleman think that after we have worked here on an act to prescribe the standards in the District of Columbia that it is entirely germane or constitutional to say that any other method will be proper——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman's citation is not at all pertinent to the matter under consideration.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman may consider it impertinent if he so desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. That authorization referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a learned and distinguished member of the Committee on the Judiciary and who ought to know that that clause is an authorization for Congress to fix standards of weights and measures all over the United States, but Congress has the right to fix any kind of regulation, notwithstanding that, in its administration of the municipal affairs of the District. This bill does not under that authorization of weights and measures propose to cover continental United States. The Congress is supreme in fixing and determining any character of standard of weights and measures, and even if we were legislating for this country generally the Congress would have the right to say that the standard should be that based on a different character of units.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield just a moment, I thought in making the point of order I would facilitate matters, and therefore I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to state that having been accorded the lofty position by the gentleman from Wisconsin upon the Judiciary Committee, I do not therefore or for that reason agree to the contention he has just been making?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That there is hereby conferred upon the superintendent, his assistants and inspectors, police power, and, in the exercise of their duties, they shall, upon demand, exhibit their badges to any person questioning their authority; and they are authorized and empowered to make arrests, with or without formal warrant, of any person violating any of the provisions of this act. The superintendent, his assistants and inspectors may, for the purpose of carrying out and enforcing the provisions of this act, and in the performance of their official duties, with or without formal warrant, enter or go into or upon any stand, place, building, or premises, and may stop any vendor, peddler, dealer, or vehicle for the purpose of making proper inspections and tests.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. It occurs to me it would be somewhat out of the ordinary to authorize the superintendent and his assistants to make arrests without a formal warrant, and I desire to ask the reason for a provision of that kind. The language in line 25 authorizes the superintendent and his assistants and inspectors, and so forth, to make arrests without a formal warrant.

Mr. WALSH. With or without?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; with or without.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why it should not go out.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out on page 18, line 25, the words "or without formal"——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Strike it all out——

Mr. BLACK. That would be better.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And let the law stand.

Mr. BLACK. Page 18, line 25, strike out the words "with or without formal warrant," and then on page 19, lines 4 and 5, strike out the same language, "with or without formal warrant."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not see any objection to that, and the general law on the subject would take the place of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, line 25, strike out the words "with or without formal warrant," and page 19, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "with or without formal warrant."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am certainly in sympathy with the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, but I think that we should not strike out all the language; otherwise without any limitation they might under this general phraseology be authorized to make arrests.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; they can make arrests under the general law not contained in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The section says:

That there is hereby conferred upon the superintendent, his assistants and inspectors, police power, and in the exercise of their duties they shall, etc., be authorized and empowered to make arrests of any persons violating any of the provisions of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They make arrests subject to the general law.

Mr. BLACK. It would be my view, as is the view of the chairman, that they would be governed by the general law relating to arrests in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the general law for misdemeanor they would have to have a warrant if such act was committed in their presence, but if it was a felony they would not have to have a warrant. I do not think the language ought to be in the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield? Would not the purpose the gentleman has in mind be accomplished if we add at the end of the sentence, page 19, in line 1, the words "in their presence," so that they would be authorized to make arrests without formal warrants of any persons violating any of the provisions of the act in their presence?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think that is necessary. If they are given police power and the right to make arrests, they would make arrests subject to the general law on the subject. I believe the language should go out and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan offer an amendment in the way of a substitute? The Chair understands he does not.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That the commissioners are authorized to appoint public weighmasters and grant licenses for the location of public scales in the District of Columbia under regulations as they may prescribe, and authorize such weighmasters to charge such fees as the commissioners may approve and fix in advance, and they may grant permits, revocable on 30 days' notice, for the location of such public scales on public space under their control. No person, other than a duly appointed and qualified public weighmaster, shall do public weighing or make any charge or accept any compensation therefor.

The following committee amendment was read:

Line 14, after the word "under," insert the word "such."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 20, on page 17, for the purpose of offering an amendment which I have submitted to the chairman of the committee and with which he is in accord.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to return——

Mr. FOSTER. Report the amendment first.

Mr. CRAMTON. In line 5 strike out the words "liquid substance" and insert in lieu thereof the words "oyster liquor."

Mr. FOSTER. I think that does not amount to anything.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to explain the amendment. I was temporarily called out of the Chamber when this section was reached. I wish to say that the Federal authorities are endeavoring to prevent the adulteration of oysters and the fleecing of the public by the inclusion of a large amount of water liquid with oysters. Now, there is a very liberal leeway given here as to measurements, wider than seems to be necessary, but it is in here, and I am trying to guard against their putting water in. There is a certain amount of liquid with the oysters necessarily. They say that they need the protection in this way for that reason, but it is not necessary to protect them against putting water in with them. And if you say "liquid substance" that enables them to add any liquid with which to adulterate. At the most they should only be allowed to sell with the oysters the liquid which comes with the oysters.

Mr. FOSTER. If they are putting water in, that is adulteration.

Mr. CRAMTON. My amendment will guard against any other liquid except that which necessarily comes with the oyster.

Mr. FOSTER. Can you tell?

Mr. CRAMTON. They tell me at the Bureau of Chemistry at the Department of Agriculture that they can tell by analysis what it is.

Mr. FOSTER. Whether there has been any water put in?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. They say they can distinguish.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe it is necessary.

Mr. PLATT. This amendment limits the amount of oyster liquor that can be sold with the oysters. You do not want to do that.

Mr. CRAMTON. They did that, and much more strictly than this section provides. The Federal authorities now would not permit oysters to be sold with 25 per cent liquor.

Mr. PLATT. If it is oyster liquor that comes out of the oyster, it is all right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. After the oyster is shucked it exudes water, and that is the water he is providing shall not exceed 25 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. But his amendment does not provide that. It provides that there must not be more than that amount of that particular liquor.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman would not care to go down and buy a quart of oysters and have a quarter of it just the oyster liquor, and the Federal regulations would not permit that, either; and certainly the gentleman does not want to permit anything else to be included. I am not responsible for the 25 per cent limit. What I am trying to guard against is the presence of any other liquid substance except the oyster liquor.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think your amendment accomplishes that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. His amendment is certainly better than the language of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. In order to stop the discussion, I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee will return to the section, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, line 5, strike out the words "liquid substance" and insert in lieu thereof the words "oyster liquor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. That wherever the word "commissioners" is used in this act, it shall be construed to mean the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Wherever the word "superintendent" is used in this act it shall be construed to mean the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to a suggestion just made by the Clerk, that the word "superintendent" has been changed to "sealer."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Unanimous consent has already been obtained that the Clerk shall change that word wherever it appears.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that unanimous consent has been secured to substitute the word "sealer" for "superintendent," it would seem that the concluding sentence of section 31 is now useless, because the word "superintendent" will not occur in the act, and I think that last sentence should go out. And I ask unanimous consent, in view of the amendment previously adopted, that the concluding sentence of section 31 be stricken out. And that meets with the approval of the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH moves to amend, on page 21, beginning with line 7, by striking out the concluding sentence of section 31, reading as follows: "Wherever the word 'superintendent' is used in this act it shall be construed to mean the Superintendent of Weights, Measures, and Markets."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky offers the following amendment: Page 22, after line 4, insert a new section, as follows:

"That every dealer in ice in the District of Columbia hereby is declared to be a public utility and subject to all the laws, rules, and regulations of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia applicable to other public utilities."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment. I ask the chairman to make some explanation as to the purpose and reasons for this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the proffered amendment is self-explanatory. It seems that one of the hardest propositions we have to control is that of ice. There is more "high riding" in dealing with ice than with almost any other commodity that is handled in this community, and it occurred to me that if every dealer in ice is put under the control and supervision of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia many instances might arise where protection could be given to the consumer, and even prices controlled.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I am not mistaken, most, if not all, of the ice that is consumed in the District is artificially prepared.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. My information is that all of it is. However, I recall that I saw in some one of the papers about a year ago the statement that a sailboat or two came in here with lake ice. But I think that was used for cold-storage purposes and not for family use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman's amendment to allow the Utilities Commission to fix the price of the ice sold in this District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is to put ice under the same restrictions with other utilities.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would it be in harmony with the gentleman's theory to increase the Public Utilities Commission by adding a department of ice and placing upon that branch of the Utilities Commission entirely ice dealers? I am led to make that observation because——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe if the commission should be increased the ice dealers would make every effort to get a representative on it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know something of the conditions that have prevailed here with reference to the sale of ice, and I am entirely in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose. But I notice now that when the Food Commissioner for the District is reported by the press to be making some reforms, which have consisted chiefly as yet in adding seriously to the cost of ice to the consumer, he has appointed an advisory commission to aid him. There are upon that advisory committee no consumers whatsoever, but simply representatives of the ice dealers, headed by the manager of one concern that has constituted almost a monopoly of the ice sales in Washington. I would be greatly in sympathy with the gentleman's proposition unless it should be followed up by the constitution of a Public Utilities Commission made up of ice dealers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no proposition to change the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia. I do not know that I would have them be the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, but I certainly would not be in favor of enlarging the commission. The commission, however, is already established. I am not endeavoring by this amendment or otherwise to change it, but it does seem to me that this amendment will be a protection to the consumer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The reservation of the point of order is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky as a new section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 34. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500, or by both such fine and imprisonment not to exceed six months. All prosecutions under this act shall be instituted by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants in the police court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 25 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to return to section 25.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us hear the amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves an objection.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Section 25 extends to the inspector police power, so that the superintendent, his assistants, and inspectors may, for the purpose of carrying out and enforcing the provisions of this act and in the performance of their official duties, make the arrest, with or without formal warrant, of any person violating any of the provisions of this act. The section contains this provision:

The superintendent, his assistants, and inspectors may, for the purpose of carrying out and enforcing the provisions of this act and in the performance of their official duties, with or without formal warrant, enter or go into or upon any stand, place, building, or premises, and may stop any vendor, peddler, dealer, or vehicle for the purpose of making proper inspections and tests.

That would give them permission to enter dwelling houses without a search warrant, according to the terms of this bill; and I suggest on page 19, line 6, as a fitting place to put in the words "except dwellings," so as to read "enter or go into or upon any stand, place, building, or premises, except dwellings."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would it not be better to strike out the word "or" at the end of line 4, and at the end of line 5 strike out the two words "without formal," so that it would then read:

And in the performance of their official duties with warrant enter or go upon.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I thought those words were stricken out on motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is unnecessary. I think it now takes care of what he desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. That would meet the very purpose the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Would not this section give him the power to enter any dwelling?

Mr. STAFFORD. If he gets authority to do it.

Mr. MAPES. The words "without formal warrant" were stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that they would not be allowed to enter any place unless they had a formal warrant.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They can enter any place or a dwelling without a warrant.

Mr. FOSTER. Those words are stricken out; and I think that cures it.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to come in as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH offers the following amendment: Page 22, line 7, after the word "repealed," insert a new section, as follows:

"This act shall take effect at the expiration of 60 days after its approval."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think the words "SEC. 36" should precede the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Clerk will insert that.

Mr. WALSH. This gives the dealers an opportunity to provide themselves with these new standards.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It would also give the ice dealers 60 days in which to go ahead and sell ice by the lump instead of by the pound. I think if the gentleman could change his amendment so that it would only give 30 days within which to change the scales and measures that would be all right.

Mr. WALSH. Then let us make it 30 days.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think in the meantime ice should be sold by the pound.

Mr. WALSH. In response to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee it seems to me it is only fair to the dealers and persons who are going to be compelled to use these new standards of weights and measures that they be given an opportunity after this act is approved by the President to procure these new scales, containers, or devices of measuring and weighing the commodities in which they deal. It would hardly seem fair to pass this act and have it approved on July 1 or August 1, and then on the next day have the sealer of weights and measures pounce down upon some dealer or merchant and say, "You have the wrong kind of a measure here. This law has taken effect and you are liable to arrest." I am willing to modify the amendment, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] suggested to me, to make it 30 days. That is agreeable to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by making it 30 days instead of 60 days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to suggest a clerical correction. We have already stricken out the words "and markets." In section

2, where the change was made from superintendent to sealer of weights and measures, we did not strike out the words "and markets," in line 5, so as to provide that this department shall be in charge of the sealer of weights and measures. I ask unanimous consent that, in line 5, page 2, section 2, the words "and markets" be stricken out, so that the section as amended will read "the sealer of weights and measures."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to return to section 2, page 2, line 5, which will be section 1 in the renumbering, and to strike out the words "and markets." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMALL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration H. R. 10893 and H. R. 10887, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken first on the bill H. R. 10893. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The next bill is H. R. 10887, relating to weights and measures. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], I call up the bill (H. R. 10748) to repeal section 896 of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request to take up the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his point of order?

Mr. GOULD. I will for the present.

DEED TO G. H. BECKWITH.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take up the bill H. R. 8655, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue deed to G. H. Beckwith for certain lands within the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., and substitute therefor the bill S. 3391, which is on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8655) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue deed to G. H. Beckwith for certain land within the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks to substitute therefor the bill S. 3391. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

An act (S. 3391) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to G. H. Beckwith for certain land within the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to convey by deed, at the appraised price, to G. H. Beckwith, two certain tracts of land in the Flathead Indian Reservation and town of St. Ignatius, Mont., lying in the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 14, township 18 north, range 20 west, Montana principal meridian, separated by a public highway 60 feet wide, and described as follows: The point of beginning "A" of the first tract is south 89 degrees and 46 minutes west 463 1/10 feet from the 1/128 corner found in place on the east line of said section 14 and north 89 degrees and 46 minutes east 33 feet from a 1/128 corner, which in turn is north no degrees and 22 minutes west 826 7/10 feet from a 1/128 corner found in place on the south line of said section 14. Thence from point of beginning "A" north no degrees and 22 minutes west 15 5/10 feet to "B," then north 56 degress and 37 minutes west 377 5/10 feet to "K," thence south no degrees and 22 minutes east 462 5/10 feet to "L," thence north 89 degrees and 35 minutes east 314 3/10 feet to "Z," thence north no degrees and 22 minutes west 237 7/10 feet to the point of beginning, "A," and containing 2 5/10 acres. The point of beginning "C" of the second tract is north no degrees and 22 minutes west 88 feet from the point of beginning "A" of the first tract, thence north 56 degrees and 37 minutes west 298 feet to "D," thence north 31 degrees and 10 minutes west 130 feet to "F," thence north 58 degrees and 50 minutes east 96 feet to "H," thence south 45 degrees and 33 minutes east 115 feet to "J," thence south 65 degrees and 6 minutes east 264 7/10 feet to "E," thence south 33 degrees and 23 minutes west 160 feet to the point of beginning "C," and containing 1 7/10 acres: Provided, That the land in said tracts shall at no time be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and should it be so used, the title to the same shall revert to the Government of the United States and all payments made thereon shall be forfeited: Provided further, That whatever business is conducted on this tract shall be under Government supervision as at present, and shall continue under such supervision so long as the United States Government retains control over the Flathead Indians at this point.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. EVANS to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 8655 was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to the enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4445. An act granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River.

AMENDING WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill S. 4482, to amend the war-risk insurance act reallotments, for printing in the RECORD under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 648).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective House as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert the following:

"That subdivision (4) of section 22 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, as amended, relating to the definition of the term 'parent,' is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(4) The term "parent" includes a father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, father through adoption, mother through adoption, stepfather, and stepmother, either of the person in the service or of the spouse.'

"SEC. 2. That four new sections are hereby added to Article I of said act, to be known as sections 27, 28, 29, and 30, respectively, and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 27. That whoever shall obtain or receive any money, check, allotment, family allowance, compensation, or insurance under Articles II, III, or IV of this act, without being entitled thereto, with intent to defraud the United States or any person in the military or naval forces of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

"'SEC. 28. That the allotments and family allowances, compensation, and insurance payable under Articles II, III, and IV, respectively, shall not be assignable, shall not be subject to the claims of creditors of any person to whom an award is made under Articles II, III, or IV, and shall be exempt from all taxation: Provided, That such allotments and family allowances, compensation, and insurance shall be subject to any claims which the United States may have, under Articles II, III, and IV, against the person on whose account the allotments and family allowances, compensation, or insurance is payable.

"'SEC. 29. That the discharge or dismissal of any person from the military or naval forces on the ground that he is an enemy alien or a conscientious objector, or a deserter, or as guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or any offense involving moral turpitude, or willful and persistent misconduct shall terminate any insurance granted on the life of such person under the provisions of Article IV, and shall bar all rights to any compensation under Article III or any insurance under Article IV.

"'SEC. 30. That this act may be cited as the war-risk insurance act.'

"SEC. 3. That section 200 of such act is hereby amended to read as follows:

The director may require such assignment or prosecution at any time after the injury or death, and the failure on the part of the beneficiary to so assign or to prosecute said cause of action in his own name within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the director, shall bar any right to compensation on account of the same injury or death. The failure on the part of the beneficiary to so assign or to prosecute the said cause of action in his own name within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the director, shall bar any right to compensation on account of the same injury or death. The cause of action so assigned may be prosecuted or compromised by the director, and any money realized or collected thereon, less the reasonable expenses of such realization or collection, shall be paid to such beneficiary, and be credited upon any future compensation which may become payable to such beneficiary by the United States on account of the same injury or death.

For the purposes of computation only under this section, the total amount of compensation due any beneficiary shall be deemed to be equivalent to a lump sum equal to the present value of all future payments of compensation computed as of the date of the award of compensation at 4 per cent true discount compounded annually. The probability of the beneficiary's death before the expiration of the period during which he is entitled to compensation shall be determined according to the American Experience Table of Mortality.

"'A conditional beneficiary is any person who may become entitled to compensation under this article on or after the death of the injured person.

Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after such publication, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled or dies, or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die either before he shall have received any of such monthly installments or before he shall have received 240 of such monthly installments, then $25 per month shall be paid to his widow from the time of his death and during her widowhood, or if there is no widow surviving him, then to his child or children, or if there is no child surviving him, then to his mother, or if there is no mother surviving him, then to his father, if and while they survive him: Provided, however, That not more than 240 of such monthly installments, including those received by such person during his total and permanent disability, shall be so paid. The amount of the monthly installments shall be appropriated between children as may be provided by regulations.'

"SEC. 19. That section 18 of this act amending the automatic insurance provisions of section 401 of the act approved September 2, 1914, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the payment of monthly installments, authorized to be made under the provisions of said section 401 as originally enacted, for the months up to and including June, 1918: Provided further, That all awards of automatic insurance under the provisions of such section 401 as originally enacted shall be revised as of the 1st day of July, 1918, in accordance with the provisions of said section 401 as amended by section 19 of this act.

"SEC. 20. That section 402 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 402. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance. The insurance shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and also during total and permanent disability to the injured person, or to any or all of them. The insurance shall be payable in 240 equal monthly installments. Provisions for maturity at certain ages, for continuous installments during the life of the insured or beneficiaries, or both, for cash, loan, paid-up and extended values, dividends from gains and savings, and such other provisions for the protection and advantage of and for alternative benefits to the insured and the beneficiaries as may be found to be reasonable and practicable, may be provided for in the contract of insurance, or from time to time by regulations. All calculations shall be based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 3½ per cent per annum except that no deduction shall be made for continuous installments during the life of the insured in case his total and permanent disability continues more than 240 months. Subject to regulations, the insured shall at all times have the right to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries of such insurance without the consent of such beneficiary or beneficiaries, but only within the classes herein provided. If no beneficiary within the permitted class be designated by the insured, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured, the insurance shall be payable to such person or persons within the permitted class of beneficiaries as would under the laws of the State of the residence of the insured be entitled to his personal property in case of intestacy. If no such person survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the reserve value, if any, of the insurance at the time of his death, calculated on the basis of the American Experience Table of Mortality and 3½ per cent interest in full of all obligations under the contract of insurance.'

"SEC. 21. That section 203 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 203. That in case one-half of an enlisted man's monthly pay is not allotted, regulations to be made by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, may require, under circumstances and conditions as may be prescribed in such regulations, that any proportion of such one-half pay as is not allotted shall be deposited to his credit to be held during such period of his service as may be prescribed. Such deposit shall bear interest at the same rate as United States bonds bear for the same period, and, when payable, shall be paid principal and interest to the enlisted man, if living; otherwise, to any beneficiary or beneficiaries he may have designated, or, if there be no such beneficiary, then to the person or persons who under the laws of the State of his residence be entitled to his personal property in case of intestacy.'

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in the debate yesterday the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and I had a colloquial discussion in which two points were raised. First, there was the issue in the House of Commons as to what was intended by secret diplomacy. On that point I want to read some of the extracts from the debate to prove that my contention was correct, that the effort in the House of Commons was not to secure public debate of treaties but it was to establish the participation of the House of Commons in the knowledge of the ratification of those treaties.

The second point was as to the attitude of the President of the United States on the subject, the Senator from Idaho maintaining that the President of the United States had taken a position that the Senate should discuss these treaties in open, and the Senator from Idaho even went so far as to say that the President had taken the position that the negotiators as well as the Senate should discuss their treaties in a public way. As a conclusive answer to the last, I desire to read a copy of a letter written by the President of the United States to the Secretary of State on the 12th of March, in the present year, with reference to the resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The Senator's resolution read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and the same is hereby, directed to consider the advisability of preparing a revision of the rules of the Senate relating to the consideration of treaties, with a view to providing that all treaties hereafter shall be considered in the open executive sessions of the Senate, report to be made to the Senate at an early day.

That was the resolution of the Senator from Idaho, and it was referred to the Committee on Rules.

With regard to this resolution the President of the United States wrote the following letter to the Secretary of State:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 12, 1918.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I wish you would be kind enough to formulate a careful and conclusive memorandum for the use of the committee of the Senate with regard to the inclosed resolution. I take it for granted that you feel as I do, that this is no time to act as the resolution prescribes, and certainly when I pronounced for open diplomacy I meant not that there should be no private discussions of delicate matters, but that no secret agreement of any sort should be entered into and that all international relations, when fixed, should be open, aboveboard, and explicit.

Cordially and sincerely, yours. WOODROW WILSON.

That was addressed to the Secretary of State, and it is a conclusive answer to the assumption by the Senator from Idaho that the President of the United States advocates the open discussion and public negotiation of treaties.

Now, referring to the issue as raised in the British House of Commons I took occasion——

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator leaves that point——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have only 10 minutes and I can not permit any interruption, if the Senator will excuse me, unless he can give it to me in his time.

The issue in the House of Commons was not the publicity of the negotiation of treaties; it was a motion by Mr. Trevelyan in the following language:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this house a standing committee of foreign affairs should be appointed, representative of all parties and groups in the house, in order that a regular channel of communication may be established between the foreign secretary and the House of Commons which will afford him frequent opportunities of giving information on questions of foreign policy and which, by allowing Members to acquaint themselves more fully with current international problems, will enable this house to exercise closer supervision over the general conduct of foreign affairs.

It was an effort not to bring about a condition of public agitation and public negotiation, but to permit the House of Commons to exercise in connection with the British executive the same powers which the Senate of the United States enjoys under the Constitution.

In supporting this motion Mr. Trevelyan made a long speech, and some of the quotations that he used and some of the extracts from his speech clearly indicate the purpose of the resolution to raise the British House of Commons to the position now enjoyed by the Senate of the United States as a participant in the fixing of foreign policies and in negotiating foreign treaties or at least in having a knowledge of what the foreign treaties are.

My time is too short to read many of these extracts, but I want to read one that is quoted not by Mr. Trevelyan but by another member, Mr. Ponsonby, who seconded the motion of Mr. Trevelyan. Among the quotations given by Mr. Ponsonby in support of the resolution and the proposition is the following extract from a member of the house, Viscount Bryce, a former ambassador to the United States. In his book, "The American Commonwealth," Mr. Bryce said:

The day may come when in England the question of limiting the at present all but unlimited discretion of the executive in foreign affairs will have to be dealt with, and the example of the American Senate will then deserve and receive careful study.

The quotation of this language by the proponent of the resolution in the House of Commons demonstrates that what they desired to achieve was to raise the House of Commons to some such position as the Senate of the United States enjoys of participation in the negotiation of treaties, and there is little or nothing in the discussion to indicate that public discussion was the great thing desired. The resolution was to enable the representatives of the people in the House of Commons, elected by the people, to participate in the ratification of treaties made by those who had been appointed by the Crown. It was to give to the representatives of the people in the House of Commons a similar power to that enjoyed by the representatives of the people in the Senate of the United States to ratify the treaties and approve the public policies which the Crown had inaugurated with other countries.

I think, Mr. President, that those two extracts and that letter from the President clearly demonstrate that the Senator from Idaho was in error yesterday in attempting to put the President of the United States in the attitude of advocating open discussion of all treaties in the Senate of the United States and that he was wrong in stating the real issue before the British House of Commons.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has discussed his amendment with very great ability. He illuminates every subject he touches; but it seems to me that he presents one subject in the form of his amendment and has devoted his discussion largely to another.

The discussion in the Senate for the most part has taken a course as if we were limited in our choice between diplomacy which was entirely secret and diplomacy which was entirely open. If that were the subject before us, I dare say the Senate would stand unanimously in favor of open diplomacy. But that is not the question which is presented to us. As a general rule, we all believe in open diplomacy, but many of us believe that wisdom suggests limitations upon the negotiation and discussion of treaties at times. The Senator from Idaho himself is not prepared to subscribe to absolutely open diplomacy under any and all circumstances, because in the amendment which he submits he expressly provides that this rule may be waived when two-thirds of the Senators voting declare in favor of waiving it.

If we were to discuss the proposition as it has existed in Europe for time out of mind, every one of us would be opposed to it. The error there is fundamental; it goes to the very system of government. There one-man power prevails. Not so here in the United States. When it is said that the troubles there have arisen out of secret diplomacy, my answer is yes; the kind of secret diplomacy which prevails in Europe. But that is not the kind of secret diplomacy which we have, if, under any circumstances, we can call the consideration of treaties behind closed doors "secret diplomacy." In my judgment, we have open diplomacy now.

Mr. President, the choice for us is between the rule of the Senate as it now obtains and the rule as contained in the amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. It is true that we pursue the policy of open discussion in public session in all legislative matters—as a general rule all discussions should take place in public—but our fathers saw fit to place a limitation upon this rule when it came to our treaties with foreign nations. Then they very wisely provided that we could discuss these in open session when we saw fit to do so. When it comes to the matter of treaties between our Government and the Indian tribes, the rules of the Senate prescribe that they shall be discussed in open session, unless the President shall submit a message in confidence, and then they shall be discussed behind closed doors.

Those who are voting upon this subject—and I say it with all due respect—are not casting their votes either for or against open diplomacy or secret diplomacy, but they are simply deciding the method which we shall pursue when it comes to the discussion of treaty matters.

What is the difference between the rule as it exists in the Senate now and the rule as proposed by the Senator from Idaho? Under the rule, as we have followed it for years, a majority of the Senate can decide in favor of open public discussion. That rule can be changed by a majority vote at any time. For many decades that rule has been one of the Senate rules. Now the Senator from Idaho presents his amendment, which, in substance, provides that all discussion shall be in the open, save and except that it may be set aside by a two-thirds vote. Suppose that rule were adopted, we could to-morrow by a majority vote change it by the same vote by which we can now go into open session if we saw fit; and, with the experience that I have had upon the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, I am not willing to say that the United States Senate has so abused its rule that we ought to set it aside.

Many of the matters which have been referred to here in the discussion of this amendment ought to be discussed in the open, and most of them, I believe, I should favor discussing in the open if they were presented to us; but I believe I can better determine when a specific treaty is before us whether or not it should be discussed in the open than I can now vote in favor of a rule that is going to tie my hands for all time to come, or at least until the rule shall be changed. So, under the circumstances, I believe that it would be the part of wisdom for us to keep the rule as it now exists in the Senate rather than to adopt the proposed change.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am in favor of the principle laid down in the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, that treaties should be considered and acted upon by the Senate in open legislative session, unless by majority the Senate by vote shall determine to close the doors. It is only a change of policy from having the session secret unless opened by a vote to having the doors opened unless closed by a vote. I think the psychology of the action of the Senate in declaring for open doors would be serviceable in establishing open diplomacy throughout the world. For that reason I favor the proposal of the Senator from Idaho, although I do not favor it as an amendment of the pending resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], for I think it would have the effect of losing some support for the original proposition. I would like to see the Senate, by majority, able to manage its own business.

I have regretted to see what appears to be a filibuster against the Underwood resolution. In effect, debate, so called, being carried on merely, apparently, to kill time, is a means by which the minority undertakes to throttle the majority. I am in favor of majority rule, and I do not think that majority rule should be set aside in favor of minority rule, but that the minority rule in the Senate should end.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Oklahoma seriously say to the Senate that he thinks that any of the speeches which have been made against the resolution of the Senator from Alabama have been made for the purpose of filibustering?

Mr. OWEN. I think so.

Mr. WATSON. That they have not been seriously made?

Mr. OWEN. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Whose speech?

Mr. OWEN. I am not going to designate Senators.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator kindly designate who has been engaged in filibustering?

Mr. OWEN. I will not do that. I am not called on to do it. I express my own opinion, and I have a right to do that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No speech has been made against the resolution over an hour in length. The only speech that has been made which has been an hour or more long, of which I know, was made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in favor of the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. This body ought to transact its business without taking days and days to dispose of a matter of this kind, whether the Senate is in favor of it or not, and I do not think these speeches are going to change a single vote on the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the adoption of the Underwood resolution would not relieve the present situation, if it is such a filibuster as the Senator from Oklahoma describes, for the reason that none of the speeches which have been made have violated that rule, except the speech made in favor of the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. I do not wish to stigmatize any Senator. I think there are perfectly easy ways in which conveniently to kill time, and let a subject under discussion run along until those who are in favor of a proposition become wearied out, and finally are willing to drop it rather than to go on with the endless consumption of time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, what does the Senator from Oklahoma mean by an "endless consumption of time"? How long has this proposed change in the rules been debated?

Mr. OWEN. It ought not to be debated more than one afternoon; that would be enough.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it had been, the Senator from Oklahoma would not have heard the debate.

Mr. OWEN. I should not have cared whether I heard it or not; I do not think it is of the least importance whether I hear it or not, for my mind is made up upon it without hearing the debate, and there is not anything that could be said in regard to the matter that would change my mind about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Oklahoma thinks we ought to adopt the system of Mexico and pass bills without any debate at all, he entertains an entirely different view of proper legislative procedure from what I do. I think this has been a very interesting debate—I have not said a word myself and have not intended to do so—but I think we have all been enlightened somewhat by the debate. It is an important matter to change a standing rule of the Senate, and it ought not to be done without full consideration.

Mr. OWEN. I think it is a shameful thing for the Senate of the United States to waste the time that belongs to the people of the United States and which ought to be devoted to considering important matters.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I will ask the Senator what important matter we should have otherwise been considering?

Mr. OWEN. I shall not be catechized by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, well, just as the Senator pleases about that.

Mr. OWEN. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator arraigns his colleagues, and yet has not the courage or the courtesy to name the Senators who have been acting badly in this matter.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Oklahoma has all the courage necessary, but certainly he is not going to violate the rule of courtesy by stigmatizing any Senator who speaks on the floor. I express my opinion that this matter has not been disposed of with the dispatch it deserved, and I express the opinion, which I think is entertained by nine-tenths of the Senators on the floor, that we waste an enormous amount of time in the Senate by useless talk about immaterial matters.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit just a word——

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that that time is very valuably occupied in preventing the passage of bad laws.

Mr. OWEN. Well, that is a concession of my original proposal, and I thank the Senator for his support.

That is all I care to say, Mr. President. I approve the principles of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho of open diplomacy, but I do not want to weaken the original proposition by having it attached in this way to the pending resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the time of the Senate for a moment in response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], that I misconstrued or misunderstood the purport of the debate in the House of Commons which took place about the 19th of March, 1918. If any Senators are interested in this debate it can be had by simply calling upon the Congressional Library for it, because it is there in full.

Mr. President, I was not in error when I said that there was no suggestion anywhere in that debate that the publicity was to be limited to the Parliament or to the House of Commons; nor was I in error when I said that the argument produced disclosed unquestionably that those advocating the rule understood that it provided for open public discussion. I wish to read two or three paragraphs to show that I was not in error in regard to these propositions. All through the discussion will be found going to the proposition of information upon the part of Parliament and information to the country as to what diplomacy was doing, what arrangements or agreements were being proposed. They asked not only for consideration upon their part, and that they might have a part in the deliberations, but specifically argue the proposition that the people themselves are entitled to information and state the reasons why the people are entitled to it. This was clearly and unmistakably disclosed all through the debate, and it was to that argument that Mr. Balfour attempted to reply. He contended that the proposition that such matters should be known to the country did not come within the purview of the President's idea, which was the text of the discussion, while others by the course of their argument, took the position that it did come clearly within the view expressed by the President.

I will read a paragraph or two, and then leave the matter to the judgment of those who want to investigate it further:

It was done without the knowledge of Parliament, and it was done without the knowledge of the country—

That is the opening sentence of the discussion upon the part of Mr. Trevelyan, referring to a certain transaction of diplomacy.

Capt. G. A. Lloyd says:

It is because the country does not understand foreign policy even in its broad aspects that misconception arises. How many people understood before the war what our moral liabilities to France and Russia were? How many people realized why they were undertaken or what was the importance of them? I do not think there is any doubt if the people had understood them that they would have refused the engagements to which they were pledged, or, at any rate, they would have seen that this country had made adequate naval and military preparations to meet them.

As I said a moment ago, the entire argument was based upon the proposition of keeping the people themselves thoroughly informed of the different steps in diplomacy which resulted in binding them.

Why had they—

That is, the people—

Why had they not this confidence? Because they never told the people what their engagements were, and the Government had to wait day after day until the enemy committed some outrage which from a sense of justice would be repudiated by the people of this country.

If you will follow up the debate, you will find that they were insisting upon this committee being formed in order that public discussion might go forward, that the newspapers might carry the debates to the country, and that the country might understand fully and perfectly the entire discussion. There is not in this debate a single suggestion that the debates in Parliament should be in secret. On the other hand, it was insisted that they should be carried on in such a way that the people should be fully informed as to what was going forward.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What does the Senator say——

Mr. BORAH. I will have to decline to be interrupted by the Senator, because I am busy now with another subject he has called up, and I am limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. President, the Senator referred to my misconstruction of the President's language and intimated that I had put the President in a false position. Of course I did not intend to do so, and I do not understand that I have done so. I do not think his language is subject to misconstruction or to misunderstanding at all. I doubt very much if my understanding in regard to it is any different from that of the President. I read here, in order that it may go into the RECORD this morning in connection with the letter which the Senator has read, precisely what the President said:

Open covenants of peace openly arrived at—

If the words "openly arrived at" were not used, the construction put upon the expression by the Senator from Nebraska might be a logical, or rather a legitimate, construction; but if you have "open covenants of peace openly arrived at," or openly agreed upon, you must necessarily proceed to a discussion of the subject matter and have the different steps taken in public.

The President is not inapt at all in the use of language, and he has evidently been very careful in excluding any possibility of arriving at secret agreements and making the agreements known after the people have been bound. He covers that subject perfectly and completely by the clause "open covenants of peace openly arrived at." Then he says:

But diplomacy shall proceed always—

Not intermittently, not spasmodically, not in some respects, not in regard to some steps, not in regard to some transactions, but—diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

Now, it is not for me to put any other construction upon that than that which the language clearly and unmistakably imparts. It was not my purpose to put any construction upon it other than that which it legitimately bears, and it was not necessary for the purpose of my argument to do so. It was as comprehensive, as complete, and as full as I could have had it had I written it myself for this particular occasion. I do not know how you would choose language or arrange clauses or frame sentences more exact and perfect to cover open diplomacy and cover it in all its different steps and phases from the beginning to the end. "Covenants openly arrived at" and "diplomacy proceeding always frankly and in the public view" can have but one meaning among men of intellectual integrity. For these reasons I contend I have not placed the President in a false position.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to state to the Senate that the amendment now pending offered by the Senator from Idaho was before the Committee on Rules and considered at length. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Oklahoma was present, but I want to state to the Senate that the committee was unanimously opposed to the rule as proposed by the Senator from Idaho. The letter read here and dated the 12th of March was brought forth by reason of an interview I had with the President of the United States after we had considered at length the amendment now proposed. I shall not go into the reasons for the action of the committee; they have been stated here.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did I understand the Senator to say that the Committee on Rules unanimously opposed the proposed amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. It did; but I do not know whether the Senator from Iowa was present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have always been in favor of the motion of the Senator from Idaho, and I can not imagine——

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not speak for those who were absent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not imagine a situation in which I would have concurred in opposition to it.

I do not doubt that the Senator from North Carolina is right in saying that the Committee on Rules declined it, but I do not remember that it was ever considered by the committee, and certainly not in my presence, nor while I was in attendance.

Mr. OVERMAN. There was a quorum present. It was on or about the 10th of March. This letter is dated the 12th of March, and the Senators who were present—I could name them—debated it for some time. Among them, the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I know, gave practically the same reasons before the committee that he gave here, which, in my opinion, were so plain and explicit and convincing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the Committee on Rules if this is not about what happened in regard to the matter—that the Committee on Rules talked it over around the table, but no report was ordered to be made on the resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. Out of deference to the Senator from Idaho, I was instructed, although I do not think I did so, to say to him that we did not think this matter ought to be brought up, and the committee was opposed to it; and I think that was about the result. There was no vote taken, but there was no one on the committee in favor of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not so sure about that, Mr. President. My recollection is that there were some Members in favor of it, but that the decided majority was against it, and that we did not order a report made on the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. My recollection is that no one was in favor of it. There was a quorum present. I do not say that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] was there. I know that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] was not there. But the result of the committee's action was as stated by the Senator from New Hampshire. Then I went to see the President, and discussed the matter with him, and that called forth this letter of March 12.

I want to say, while I am upon my feet, that I have always been opposed to cloture and the limitation of debate; and I only consented even to the Underwood resolution when an amendment was offered limiting it to the period of the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, during the discussion of this amendment, on the 7th of the present month, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] entered into a very complete and interesting discussion of the pending proposed treaty with the Republic of Colombia. The views which the Senator entertains regarding the merits of the controversy leading up to that proposed treaty may be correct, but they are entirely different from those which I entertain upon the subject.

In view of the fact that during the present session this treaty may be taken up for final consideration, I have determined on Friday next, at the close of the routine morning business, to address the Senate upon the subject, particularly with regard to the facts surrounding the unfortunate transaction which culminated in the recognition of the Republic of Panama, and which, in my judgment, make some final adjustment of the consequent difference with Colombia extremely necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only wish to express my earnest conviction of the harm which would be caused by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. Publicity of a treaty, and publicity of the reasons which influence support of or opposition to particular provisions of a treaty, are very different. To require all discussion of treaties to be made in public is to make it impossible for Senators to freely exchange their views upon the subject.

When we determine just what we are willing to agree upon as a treaty with a foreign nation, we are influenced by views in regard to the relations of our country to such nation. We may properly express these views to each other while it might complicate our relations with the other nation if they were made public. It would be utterly impossible to give each other freely the benefit of our views upon the important questions involved in a treaty before the Senate unless we could give them in private, in executive session. Indeed, at this time, it is very doubtful whether all treaties should be made public.

We are in the midst of a great world war. We may desire to make treaties with some nations that we do not wish our enemies to understand. If all the nations of the world would make their treaties public, we might do so also; but it is entirely possible that at this time it may be important to make treaties which the public interests would not permit to be made public. But surely we must preserve the right to discuss treaties in private. To put on the Senate the handicap of requiring a two-thirds vote of Senators to give that privilege would remove the opportunity for free discussion and might work a great national injury.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] now subject to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following:

This rule shall not become effective until and unless the principal nations shall have agreed to publicly discuss and publish all treaties by them being considered or that have been consummated.

Mr. REED. I should like to have that read now in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Idaho, so that the Senate will get the proposition as amended.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the Senator from Idaho, as modified by him, reads as follows:

That all treaties shall be considered and acted upon by the Senate in its open or legislative session unless two-thirds of the Members of the Senate by yea-and-nay vote shall determine to close the doors during the consideration of the particular treaty upon which the vote to close the doors is taken.

That this rule shall not be limited to the period of the war.

To which the Senator from Missouri proposes to add:

This rule shall not become effective until and unless the principal nations shall have agreed to publicly discuss and publish all treaties by them being considered or that have been consummated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that puts the question squarely before the Senate whether we want, during a war, to tell the Germans all the negotiations that we may have with France and England and Japan and the South American States and other nations of the earth, including the neutrals, or whether the proponents of this resolution are willing to wait until all of the principal nations of the earth shall have agreed to expose their diplomacy as we are now asked to expose ours.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, where the Constitution of a country requires that before a treaty can go into effect it must have the approval of two-thirds of a body consisting of 96 Members elected by the people, so distributed over the country that two of them come from each State in a great continental empire such as this, it is inconceivable that any injury of the people should result from the provisions of such a treaty which in any sense could be said to be due to a discussion of its terms in a closed session of that body.

There can not possibly be in the United States of America secret diplomacy, so far as treaties are concerned, in the sense in which that term is used in Europe. I should think that the Republic would have fallen upon evil days if there is not some one in such a numerous and such a representative body as an elective assembly of 96 Members who will advise the American people of any lurking dangers to their peace and welfare in our negotiations or contractual relations with foreign countries. To say that under all circumstances the discussion among ourselves as to the advisability of the ratification or amendment of treaties should be in the open, it seems to me would put the American people in a position of impotence in their foreign relations.

I expect to vote against the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Washington before he took his seat if I did not hear the Senator from Nebraska quote from the former ambassador at Washington, Mr. Bryce, as to the treaty-making power and the manner in which that power was exercised here? I thought I heard him make that remark.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is correct. That was quoted by Ponsonby in supporting the resolution of Trevelyan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to read, without giving the language my approval, from Bryce's American Commonwealth, where he says:

There have been movements within the Senate against maintaining secrecy, particularly with regard to the confirming of nominations to office; and there is also a belief in the country that publicity would make for purity. But while some of the black sheep of the Senate love darkness because their works are evil, other Members of undoubted respectability defend the present system because they think it supports the power and dignity of their body.

I find running all through Bryce's American Commonwealth strictures upon the power exercised by the Senate. He assumes all the way through these volumes—I have not read them recently, but I have been familiar with them in the past—that the Senate is consulted in the preliminary steps of the Executive regarding treaties. He says in this work that it is wise for the Executive to consult the Senate; that he has a better expression of public opinion which exists outside of the Government if he consults the Senate, and consults them early, and that he ought to take the Committee on Foreign Relations into his confidence.

We have defeated several treaties here behind closed doors during my experience. I think we defeated one with Great Britain which provided for the general arbitration of all differences that might arise between the two countries, and proposed to farm out the functions of the Senate to a commission appointed by the President who should pass upon questions of vital importance to the American Government and to the American people; and we defeated that treaty, I think, in secret. What would have happened to the treaty if it could have been discussed in the open? I venture the assertion that if the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty had been discussed in the open it would not have lasted 48 hours in the face of the protests of the American people; and yet we nearly had that treaty foisted upon us, by which a great foreign power was to have equal rights with ourselves in the arming and the defense of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

I do not desire myself to support any radical innovation in the conduct of our foreign affairs. I am quite content to let the matter go along as it has gone along; but inasmuch as the issue is made I think a little more light will not do any harm in the consideration of a treaty. Whenever necessary the doors may be closed.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Michigan always wishes to be accurate, but he is mistaken in his statement that those two treaties were discussed in secret, and that they were rejected by the Senate. The fact is they were discussed in the open, they were amended by the Senate, and on account of the amendments not being satisfactory to the negotiating powers ratifications never were exchanged. I recollect that because I was vitally interested in the matter, having negotiated the treaties; and I particularly recollect reading in the morning paper, the day after it was delivered, a very elaborate speech by the senior Senator from Massachusetts in relation to these treaties.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Pennsylvania is correct. I devoted a little of my own time to an expression of my views upon that treaty, which views I have never changed. The idea of farming out to independent appointees of the Government the power to pass upon vitally important questions with regard to our country's relations, thus depriving the States of their power in the Senate, never appealed to me.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will permit me to say so, that was one of the very few times when he was most grievously mistaken in the construction of a written contract.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps so. I am not challenging either the patriotism or the foresight or wisdom of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because I find him a very safe pilot and an excellent guide. He may have been right and I may have been wrong. I was not able to follow him at all times while he was Secretary of State, although I greatly admire him, but I did follow him with a great deal of pleasure all the time he was Attorney General in the Cabinet of President McKinley, because I know he is a wise and sagacious lawyer; but I can see no harm coming from an open discussion of treaties in most instances. If we want the doors closed, we can close them. I see vastly more harm in strangling the senatorial right to discuss freely questions of vital importance to his State than I do in the proposition of the Senator from Idaho.

The other day I referred to the Senator from Alabama, who was put out of the House of Representatives under a cloture rule; and I will tell you how it happened, if I remember it correctly. I may be mistaken; but, as I recollect, the meeting of the Committee on Rules in the House of Representatives was called in the morning, and when the committee got together the Republican members decreed what should take place. Then they sent for Mr. McMillin, of Tennessee, a minority member; and when he came in, as I now recollect the story, Speaker Reed said jokingly: "Benton, Joe, and Mac, and myself have resolved to perpetrate the following outrage," and debate was cut off under this special rule. They greased the skids and our friend from Alabama went out of the House of Representatives, which he would have adorned and which he afterwards adorned, with as much speed and alacrity as I ever saw a member ejected from a parliamentary body. [Laughter.]

I presume I have exhausted my time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived the vote will be taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. REED. It has been suggested to me that there ought to be a clean-cut record vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Idaho taken separately. I will, therefore, withdraw my amendment and reserve the right to offer it in the Senate should the amendment of the Senator from Idaho be adopted here.

Mr. BORAH. Upon the amendment——

Mr. OWEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Idaho.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it is too late.

Mr. BORAH. Upon the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is not present, and because of that pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague is necessarily absent and is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote, being unable to obtain a transfer. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. If the Senator from New York were present and not paired, he would vote "yea."

I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and in his absence I will withdraw my vote, which was cast in the affirmative, and let the pair stand.

Mr. LEWIS. I rise merely to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] occasioned by personal illness and that of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] by illness in his family.

Mr. BORAH. I was requested to state that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent and that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORAH. I desire at this time to reserve the amendment for a vote thereupon in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There will be no Senate for it; it is not a bill. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended to offer some objection to this proposed amendment to our rules, but I do not propose to take the time of the Senate in doing it to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can the amendment which has just been voted on be offered as an amendment again in the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is not a bill; it is merely a Senate resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A parliamentary inquiry. We are not in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not.

Mr. BORAH. We never have been in Committee of the Whole on the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Never.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the question of amending the rules as is proposed is an old matter. It has been discussed over and over again. It has been before the Committee on Rules many times and never secured the assent of that committee. But for some inscrutable reason there seems to be a change in the Senate in reference to the matter, and apparently a majority of the Senate are in favor of the proposed amendment.

To my mind it is a great mistake that is about to be committed, if it shall be committed. There is no reason for it on earth. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] pointed out on yesterday, there has never been a time in the history of any legislative body such as this when a matter of important legislation has been passed with so little debate. There has been no disposition on either side of the Chamber to unduly delay legislation, and I know there is not in the mind of any Senator on this side of the Chamber any purpose of that kind. We are getting along magnificently well. A few more important measures are to be considered, and if we go along in our usual way, after proper consideration they will receive a vote of the Senate.

Mr. President, we have had an illustration of that to-day. The important amendment of the Senator from Idaho, which was debated for perhaps a little over one day, very intelligently and very illuminatingly, so far as some of us are concerned, was voted upon by unanimous consent, just as all such important matters are when the Senate pursues the even tenor of its way.

During my somewhat protracted membership of this body a few filibusters have been engaged in. I was the victim of one of those filibusters, Mr. President. A bill in which I was deeply interested, which had been debated for weeks in this body, as I remember it, was at the end of a session defeated by a filibuster. At that time I felt very keenly on the subject, but when I came to look it all over I was led to the conclusion that the evils that grew out of our present system were insignificant compared to the benefits that grew out of it. I think I have myself participated in two filibusters during the time I have been a Member of this body, and I have never had occasion to regret it. I believed that they were justified. I believe that great good came to the country because of those protracted discussions.

Mr. President, if there was any apparent concerted action or any indication of it on the part of Members of this body to delay the legislation that is to follow there might be some excuse for this change in the rules. But there is no such intimation; there is no such purpose, and why we should change the rules under the circumstances surpasses my comprehension.

It is suggested in the resolution, indeed it is a part of the resolution, that it shall continue during the existence of the war. Mr. President, no Senator has unduly prolonged debate on any vital question concerning the war. Both sides of the Chamber have been united in passing those important measures for the protection of our institutions and our Government and for winning the war, and no suggestion even has been made that any filibuster should be organized or should be consummated on either side of the Chamber.

Now, why change the rule? What is the necessity for it? For the life of me, Mr. President, I can not see any earthly necessity for it. I do hope that the Senate will take pause and will consider this matter without any prepossessions or prejudices or without any misconception of the facts and will vote down the proposed amendment to the rules.

Mr. President, if there were any necessity for it, so far as the passage of war legislation is concerned, I would vote for it as freely and as cheerfully as any Member of this body, but there is nothing in sight which justifies that view. Nobody has yet suggested that he proposes to antagonize war legislation. On the contrary, every Senator who has stood on this floor has declared that he was for war legislation and for prosecuting this war until Germany was brought to terms and peace resulted. Now, why change the rules of the Senate under those circumstances, under that pretense?

But, Mr. President, it has been suggested, mildly suggested, by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that we will have a great bill coming here, a revenue bill, and that it is important that its passage shall not be delayed. I have no fear that its passage will be delayed if the rules remain as they are to-day.

But, Mr. President, if that and the desire expressed by more than one Senator that we ought to have a recess during the heated term of this year are the only reasons—and they are the only ones I have heard enunciated as yet—then I propose to offer an amendment to facilitate, if a change of this rule will facilitate—and I have my doubt as to that—the passage of the revenue bill and allow Senators to get the much-coveted recess they all seem to desire. Therefore I offer this amendment to the resolution and ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the first line of the resolution, strike out the words "period of the present war" and insert the words "calendar year 1918."

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have just a word to say on the pending amendment, which, I understand, is to limit the purpose of this rule, if adopted, to the 1st day of January next. The resolution itself limits the life of the rule to the war. I do not think the rule can be tried out in the time between now and January. I do not think it would be wise to adopt the resolution if it has that limitation on it. I think the resolution ought to stand as it is presented to the Senate, or will be presented by the amendment we have agreed to in committee, limiting the life of the rule to the time of the war. I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is not in the Chamber. I therefore for the present withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as before, and requesting that it stand until the resolution is disposed of, unless changed, I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but I am at liberty to vote on this question, as he would vote the same way as I shall vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is absent. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Making the same announcement as I did a while ago as to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I understand if present the Senator from New York would vote as I shall vote, and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the statement just made by the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Baird	Gerry	McLean	Sterling
Borah	Gronna	New	Sutherland

So Mr. GALLINGER'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the resolution, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "and," on page 2, line 23, insert "which right may be exercised at any time before final vote thereon."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the reason why I think that amendment is necessary is because of the ruling of the Chair heretofore that, when amendments are presented to the Senate, they must be controlled by the rule which may be adopted concerning the length of time for argument as to amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has a substitute for the original provision as reported, which has been agreed to by the members of the Rules Committee, and if his substitute be adopted, as I hope it will be, it will cover the very point which is embraced in the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Colorado. I merely rise to ask the Senator if he will not withdraw his amendment until the Senator from Iowa shall have offered his substitute, and then see if it does not cover the point which he desires covered?

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Iowa covers it, very well and good; but it does seem to me that we ought to have a clear understanding that the right of a Senator to speak for an hour and a half is secured, and that it shall be made clear that any Senator, no matter when he desires to occupy that time, shall have a right to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is done by the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Iowa, and I think if the Senator from Colorado will permit the substitute to be offered he will be satisfied of that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from Iowa kindly read his substitute in order that I may be satisfied on that point?

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment which I intend to offer as soon as I can be recognized has already been read into the RECORD, I think, but on the point suggested by the Senator from Colorado it reads:

Provided further, That when an amendment is pending a Senator may use all or any part of his time allowed for debate upon the bill or resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That amendment seems to me to cover the exact point to which I refer, and I therefore withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado withdraws his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I present the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 it is proposed to strike out lines 21 to 24, inclusive, and insert the following:

That no Senator shall occupy more than 1 hour and 30 minutes in debate on any bill or resolution and not more than 20 minutes on any amendment proposed thereto: Provided, That the Senate upon request may enlarge the time by a majority vote, the question to be decided without debate: Provided further, That when an amendment is pending a Senator may use all or any part of his time allowed for debate upon the bill or resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this is the amendment——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I merely want to make an inquiry. As I heard the amendment read, the expression "enlarge the time" was used. Should not the word be "extend"?

Mr. CUMMINS. What does "enlarge" mean?

Mr. ASHURST. I am merely asking what is the word used.

Mr. CUMMINS. I use the word "enlarge" because I thought that was the proper word. It means, of course, the same as "extend."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this is the amendment read the other day, and concerning which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] suggested that it was the result of some conference between the members of the Committee on Rules, that it would be accepted by the majority of the Committee on Rules, and would be substituted for the amendment proposed in the report of the committee on the original resolution. I will inquire of the Senator from Alabama if I am right in that statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that I have conferred with all the members of the Rules Committee, and we discussed the question together—that is, the members of the Rules Committee who voted to report the original resolution—and this amendment is agreeable to them all as a substitute for the language of the resolution as reported. If I have the right, under the rules of the Senate, to accept it, I am willing to accept it as a substitute for the amended resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that the Committee on Rules, through any authorized member, can ask that this amendment be substituted for the one printed, so that thereafter it may stand as the amendment proposed by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, I wish to say that I have been conferred with, and I understand that those members of the committee who concurred in reporting the original resolution are satisfied with it and are willing to have the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa substituted for the resolution as reported.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, I suggest that that can only be done by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is objection, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It can not be done by agreement between Senators.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not if there is objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object to it myself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To clear up the matter, so that amendments may have their proper place hereafter and the real issue before the Senate may be presented, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa be accepted in place of the resolution as reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Being opposed to the substitute, I must object to unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, then I exercise what I suppose is a right that can not well be denied and offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk and which has been read. I intend to assume in the discussion which will follow that the amendment so proposed is the report of the committee, because that is the fact at the present time, and it is idle to debate the terms of the original amendment or substitute of the committee when it is well known that in the end the amendment which I have proposed will be the judgment and the proposal of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator object to adding after the word "That" the words "during the present war"? The original resolution contained those words, and it was adopted by the committee with that understanding.

In publishing the Senate Manual it is desired to print the new rule and not to print the entire resolution; but, unless the words to which I have referred are embodied in the rule itself, it will be necessary in preparing the Manual to add a footnote explaining that the new rule is to remain in force only during the continuance of the war or to print the entire resolution. So I ask the Senator if he will not consent to add the words I have suggested, so that they may become a part of the rule itself?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the change suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, but I hope he will defer a discussion of the verbal arrangement until the debate has neared its end. I would immediately accept it if it were not true that, in my opinion, the rule proposed has nothing whatever to do with the war. I have acquiesced in the preceding part of the resolution, which limits the operation of the rule to the period of the war, not because I am about to insist that this is a war measure or that it is needed on account of the pendency of the war. I am for the amendment which I have proposed both in war and in peace; and, in my judgment, it is as necessary in time of peace as in time of war. That is the only reason why I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he await the conclusion, at least, of my discussion before he seeks to introduce those words into the proposed amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator would not take any advantage of this resolution, but I want to say that the committee never would have reported the resolution except that it was limited to the war. I wish to say further that there are plenty of us here who would not vote for the resolution if it were proposed to make it a permanent rule. Therefore I was anxious that the Senator should accept the modification that I have proposed, for, I repeat, the committee would not have indorsed the Senator's amendment except with that understanding.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina can no more control my opinions than I can control his.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not trying to control the Senator's opinions.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I realize the truth of the statement just made by the Senator from North Carolina, and this amendment does not propose to change the action of the committee in that respect, which does limit the limitation upon debate to the period of the war. I expect that to be in the resolution. It matters not whether it is in the preceding part or in the body of the rule itself. I followed the order which the committee determined, namely, to prescribe the period of the rule in an independent paragraph, but I shall have no objection whatever to its insertion wherever it is thought desirable to make the limitation both effectual and orderly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks that this resolution, to which he is giving his support, is not needed to expedite the passage of important war measures?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend to prove, if it can be done, and from my viewpoint, that the evidence is abundant and conclusive that the rule is imperatively needed to enable the Senate to do the business with which it is charged under the Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I mean particularly during the time of war. Does the Senator think a rule like this is necessary to facilitate and expedite the necessary legislation during the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think it is needed at all times, both during war and during peace.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But I mean does the Senator think it would be more efficacious during the war than during times of peace?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will leave the Senator from South Carolina to draw his own conclusions with regard to that when he shall have heard, if he cares to hear, the views which I entertain with regard to the subject.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the reason why I have asked the question in rather an insistent way is because I wanted to see what was the Senators' attitude from that side as to the manner in which the Senate has met the awful responsibility of legislating for this war; and I wanted to know if it was the Senator's position that not having met it as the Senate should meet it, some of us must get together and formulate such an additional rule as will make us do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senate and the Congress as well have met the demand which has been made upon them by the extraordinary condition not only of our own country but of the world with superb fidelity, and I think Congress will continue to do so.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And therefore the Senator does not think this rule is necessary in order to have them expeditiously and effectually accomplish the tasks before them?

Mr. CUMMINS. One can not tell what the future will develop; but so far as the past is concerned, while I think that we could have disposed of the war measures in less time than has been consumed, it is not within my heart to charge any Member of the Senate with unduly delaying the disposition of any bill or resolution that has had for its purpose the prosecution, and the diligent and effective prosecution, of the war.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, the Senator has answered fully just what I was driving at. Therefore the Senator's advocacy of this rule is because he desires it to be permanent legislation. That is the main thing that is troubling me.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a minute? The Senator from South Carolina is utterly mistaken. If he reads the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, he will see that it does not propose to amend that part of the resolution, if I am correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. The resolution starts out, as reported by the committee:

Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate shall be amended by adding thereto the following.

That is left in the resolution. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa does not propose to change that. It leaves that in it, so that if we adopt his amendment it will not affect it. It leaves the resolution to operate only during the pendency of the war.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but the point I was getting at was to get the Senator's mental attitude, the real purpose that was actuating him. I did not think he would stand here and say that there had been any undue delay in passing the measures necessary for the prosecution of this war. Therefore, having admitted that, as he has admitted it, the principle that is actuating him is to establish a precedent and make this permanent legislation after the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from South Carolina is not seriously concerned in the motive which impels me. I think he had better concern himself with the wisdom or unwisdom of this rule; and if I can not convince him that the Senate is hampered and embarrassed and shackled by the antiquated and obsolete rules under which we do the business committed to us, then I would not hope for his vote for this amendment, unless he can be persuaded by some one on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No, Mr. President; if the Senator will allow me, I think a matter of this kind is largely a question of principle that is to actuate the entire Senate, and should not be in any sense made a party question. Whatever rule we adopt will affect both sides.

Mr. CUMMINS. The fact that I am earnestly supporting the amendment to the rule, or the additional rule which has been proposed, and which apparently is supported much more largely upon the Democratic side than upon the Republican side, ought to indicate to the Senator from South Carolina that there is no partisan feeling or partisan prejudice moving me in the matter. I am looking at it solely from the standpoint, I hope, of the public good and the general interest.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think it can be stated that it is divested of any partisan taint when the Senator from South Carolina is happy to say to the Senator from Iowa that he is as strongly opposed to any modification as the Senator is in favor of a modification.

Mr. CUMMINS. I knew that; and the Senator from South Carolina, with his usual insistence, has endeavored to neutralize what I have to say and destroy the argument which I propose to make by this interruption in advance, which was not for the purpose of securing any information——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. CUMMINS. But for the purpose of disclosing, I assume, that I thought that this was not only a war measure, but a peace measure as well. I forgive him. I have such great affection for him that I forgive this attempt on his part, which will be futile, because I shall proceed just as I have outlined the subject in my mind.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; Mr. President, will the Senator just let me make an explanation on the ground of the good friendship that does exist between us? The point that I wanted to get at was this: Quite a number of Senators on both sides have been saying: "Oh, let us vote for the resolution; it is simply a war measure; it will terminate at the end of the war," when I knew that honest, straightforward, frank Senators like the Senator from Iowa, and I hope all the balance of the Senators who take that position, wanted it to be a permanent thing; that was all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is complimenting me at the expense of some very estimable Members of the Senate; and while I am always anxious and willing to accept a compliment, I do not like to do it when others are disparaged in the persiflage in which the Senator from South Carolina indulges.

Mr. President, naturally I am very seriously concerned when I find myself disagreeing with many of my associates upon this side of the Chamber respecting the subject before the Senate. I would gladly follow Senators of longer service and more experience if I could persuade myself that it is wise to continue the work of the Senate under the rules and practices which now prevail. Inasmuch as I intend to comment with the utmost frankness upon some of the rules and practices of the Senate, I think I ought to say, so that I may not be misunderstood, that I hold the Senate, with its powers and responsibilities and dignities under the Constitution, as the greatest and most important legislative body in the world. From my standpoint, it is the highest honor, save one, than can be conferred upon any citizen of the United States to be enrolled in the membership of the Senate. Moreover, the men who now make up the Senate, without exception, are likeable, intellectual, honest, and loyal. I do not believe it would be possible to gather together a like body of men with more or higher qualifications for the discharge of public duties than the men who now compose the Senate of the Republic. I believe, however, that these men are from day to day hindered in the discharge of their duties by a series of rules, some of which, at least, were composed for other times and other conditions, and which at this moment are as obsolete and as inefficient as would be the caravels of Columbus in transporting our millions of soldiers to the shores of France. I believe they no more answer the demands of this time than would the steamboat of Robert Fulton fulfill the needs of the commerce of the twentieth century. I believe that some of the practices which have grown up under these rules present a constant obstruction in the path of every Senator as he endeavors to do his duty under the Constitution and under the commission which the people of his State have conferred upon him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask the Senator if it is his intention to discuss the various antiquated rules to which he alludes? The Senator's amendment only deals with the question of debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all. I intend to refer incidentally to some of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator does not propose, in his present effort, to amend or repeal or change them in any way?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to offer further amendments to the rules as amendments to this particular resolution. The Senator from New Hampshire will know, and does know, that with all my inexperience and immaturity in public affairs, yet with some zeal, I have been attempting to change these rules from the time I entered the Senate until now; and I probably shall not refer to any or many of these rules in the critical way which I indicated save those which I have at some time attempted to modify.

Mr. GALLINGER. I really felt that the Senator, in his rather wholesale indictment of the rules, relegating them to the age of the stagecoach, and Fulton's steamboat, and all that, ought to tell us exactly what he proposes to do at some time, if not now, to modernize those rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will. I shall endeavor to satisfy the Senator from New Hampshire not upon the soundness of the modifications which I have proposed or may propose, but upon my sincerity and good faith in the suggestions I have just made.

Mr. President, I think I ought to say, in the first place—although I observe that there is not a single Democratic Member of the Senate now seated, and I care nothing about it, for my course in this matter is not dictated by any influence from the other side of the Chamber—I beg the pardon of the Chair; I referred only to those who were seated in the places from which they vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the observation the Senator has made does not surprise some of us. We were very harshly lectured this morning by a Senator belonging to the other side of the Chamber who had not been present to answer to a call of the Senate during the entire debate on this proposition, and yet he called us to task for having wasted time; so the Senator may experience the same result after he gets through.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have noticed these inconsistencies upon the part of some Senators with pain and regret.

It has been suggested by some of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber that this resolution was the outcome of presidential or administration desire. In all fairness, I must be permitted to say that the resolution which is now before the Senate, whether it be the one reported by the committee or the one which I have proposed to substitute for it, did not emanate from the President of the United States nor, so far as I know, from any department of the Government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has not an agreement been reached between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to accept the Senator's amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so. Not only so, but the resolution which the Senate is now considering, no matter whether it be the one originally reported by the committee or the one which the committee is now willing to accept, is not of Democratic origin. I beg that my friends upon this side of the Chamber in their further discussion of the subject, if the discussion is pursued, will remember that fact and devote themselves to the merits of the proposal. It may not strengthen it any, but fairness to my brother Senators upon the majority side of the Chamber, as well as to the administration, compels me to say that I am the proposer of this limitation upon debate, and it came about in this way.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] introduced a resolution the substitute for which we are now considering, which, as will be observed, is a resolution proposing a modification of the rule, so that a motion for the previous question shall be in order in the Senate, a radically different thing from the proposal to limit debate upon a bill or a resolution. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, and it so happened that I was selected as a member of the subcommittee to consider the resolution, the other members being the author of the resolution, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. When we came together as a subcommittee I stated what I had stated many times before, oftentimes in the Senate, that I was opposed to the previous question, and that I could not bring myself to concur with the view of the Senator from Alabama in imposing upon the Senate the rigors and the limitations, oftentimes the injustices, of the previous question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment. But I stated that I was in favor of a reasonable limitation upon debate upon bills and resolutions in the Senate, and that if they would accept that principle in some fair form instead of the previous question I would be glad to join them in an effort to prepare a substitute and report it to the full committee. They did accept the suggestion I made, and together we prepared and reported to the full committee the resolution now printed and before the Senate, and the full committee authorized the report to the Senate.

This is the history of the origin and the development and the progress of the proposal to impose a limitation upon debate in the Senate. I thought it was due to the whole situation that I should state what I have stated in order to rid the atmosphere of the least political or partisan tinge, and so that all Senators might vote upon the proposal according to their consciences and convictions without any exterior influence whatsoever.

I am now glad to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the Senator from Iowa knows as well as I do that we have a limitation upon debate now; in fact, we have the previous question in a certain form; that is, a majority of Senators can really close debate. The Senator is opposed to the previous question, a rule which we now have, and which is in force. Does not the Senator think we ought to repeal that rule before we adopt another rule to limit debate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have never regarded the rule which we adopted last year as any form of the previous question, but it is a rule which is intended to bring discussion to a close. While I did not object to the adoption of the rule under the circumstances under which it was proposed, I have never approved as an abstract question the provisions of the rule we already have.

Mr. GRONNA. I understood the Senator to say that he does not approve it. As a matter of fact, we do have the previous question. You do not call it that, but when 16 Senators sign an agreement the majority of the Senate can at any time stop debate. We have that rule in force now, and as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] suggested to me, if this new rule is adopted, we shall have two rules, one conflicting with the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, of course, the trend of the question proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, and I think he will find when the occasion arises we are not widely apart with regard to it. But I intend, so far as I can, upon this occasion to adopt the maxim: Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. I am interested now only in the rule which the committee has proposed, and I want to demonstrate, if I can, its value in this legislative assembly.

I shall now satisfy, I hope, the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and refer to some of the things which, I think, cripple and tend to destroy the usefulness of the Senate. In the first place, the Senate committees are altogether too large. I should like to know whether those who are so bitterly opposing this amendment can not join me at least in that belief. The committees of the Senate are too large, and they can not and they do not transact the business which is committed to them with either dispatch or efficiency. I should like to see the committees very materially reduced in number.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I cordially concur in the view the Senator is expressing on that point. We have frequently enlarged our committees, and oftentimes in violation of our rules, which prescribe the number who should constitute the committee, but we have added to them—I say "we"; those in charge of reporting the committees have done it—until now we have pretty nearly a mass meeting in some of our committees. I agree with the Senator that that is a grievance which ought to be remedied, but it certainly could not be used as a just criticism against the rule and as against our method of procedure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Our practice in that respect is the equivalent of a rule, because the membership of the committees was fixed originally by the rules, and those rules are modified from time to time by the action of the Senate in assigning other or additional members to the committees. So I am glad to be able to start with the universal apparent agreement that we ought to reduce the membership of the important committees of the Senate. Why is it so agreed? It is agreed because we are all conscious of the fact, whether we are willing to admit it or not, that the committees are incapable of doing the work which they have to do. Each Senator is assigned to more committees than he can successfully attend. He is given more duties with regard to committees than he can possibly perform; and that is a change that ought to be made, not in the formal rule of the Senate but in the practices of the Senate. No Senator should be assigned to more than one important committee, and he should then regard the service upon that committee as being as sacred and as important as the service upon the floor of the Senate.

I do not believe there will be any disagreement with regard to that proposition, and I intend to connect the rule which is now under discussion with the suggestions I have just made, because there is an intimate and direct relation between them. If our committees were properly composed and if Senators were so distributed among the committees that they could give diligent and thoughtful and competent and perservering attention to the work before the committees, we might be able to advance a step in the work that we fail to do.

It has been asserted over and over again during this debate that the Senate is an efficient body. I deny it. It has been asserted over and over again that it does its work completely and well. I deny it, and I intend to prove it. I agree that in great measures which involve the happiness and the welfare of all the people and which become under the conditions of the time imperative the Senate performs its work diligently and persistently, and wisely, too, and I have no criticism whatsoever upon the Senate in that respect. I do not believe that with regard to such measures there is any need for a limitation upon the privilege or right of debate. I am speaking, of course, of the matter from my standpoint. Hitherto in discussing this rule Members who have spoken seem to have thought of it only in regard to those high, important, vital proposals of legislation which come from time to time before the Senate, and because they have satisfied themselves with regard to legislation of that character there is no need for the rule, they have reached the conclusion that it is unnecessary to reform our practices in that respect and that we may safely go forward under the conditions which have heretofore prevailed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I very cordially agree with the Senator that our committees are too large. I have frequently expressed that view both in the committee rooms and outside of the committee rooms. But I do not agree with the Senator when he says that no Senator ought to be on more than one important committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to modify that. I think there may be some exceptions. What I really meant was to express the idea that no Senator ought to be on a committee if he can not attend to the work of that committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly that is true. Now I turn to the assignments of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the Senator will not make me too prominent in that respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. I, then, will not do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have a very satisfactory list of assignments and I attend the committee meetings.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator, he does, and for that reason——

Mr. CUMMINS. I attend the meetings of the committees.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree to that, and it would be a distinct loss to the Senate if the Senator from Iowa should be dropped from any one of the three or four important committees of which he is a member.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator knows as well as I do that there are many committees which so conflict with each other in their meetings that it becomes impossible for the members of the committees to attend to the work which they have promised to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is undoubtedly true, but I think it would be a very difficult matter to adjust it so as to obviate to any great extent those difficulties. I have tried to do it myself when I was chairman of the committee on committees on this side of the Chamber. I tried to adjust the committees so that their meetings would not conflict with the meetings of other committees. The trouble is that the days are not as numerous as are the committee meetings.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I recognize all the difficulties, but something ought to be done to reduce and minimize the collisions and conflicts which now constantly occur in the engagements of committees.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. Mr. President, I have wasted more time in sitting in committee rooms waiting for members to appear to constitute a quorum than it would have taken to debate half the important bills which come before the Senate. I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not consider that there is a great advantage arising from the large committees in allowing the whole country, all sections, to be represented? Take, for instance, the Committee on Finance, or the Committee on Commerce, or the Committee on Appropriations, three important committees in which the whole country could not be very well represented if the committee memberships were reduced to any considerable extent.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not see that difficulty as the Senator from North Dakota does. Of course, I agree that some attention ought to be given to geographic considerations, but it is only necessary to enlarge the divisions in order to enable a fewer number to represent the country just as well as the larger number now does.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I am very largely in agreement with the Senator from Iowa in the criticism he is making of committee assignments. It is true, undoubtedly—as we have all had the experience—that we have been delayed in attending committee meetings by our attendance upon other committee meetings equally important. It seems to me that one way to overcome that objection would be to somewhat shorten the hours of the session of the Senate, and not have committee meetings when the Senate is in session.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am coming to that, because that is one of the apparent demands of the time. But if we are to be met, whenever there is a proposal to change the rules, by the reverence and awe and submission to the traditions of the olden time, and to the views of the forefathers, we will never get any change in the rules, and it is against that inflexible attitude of many Senators that I am appealing to at this moment.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa two questions, if he will allow me to interrupt him. First, I am very cordially in accord with his statement about the waste of time in waiting for committees to meet, and I want to know how the limitation of debate is going to cure that evil. Then,

If I may state the second question, the Senator has just said the Senate has performed its duty promptly and wisely on all big questions which have been brought to us in these important times, and, inferentially, he says that we are not attending to the matters of less importance or of local importance. I want to know how a rule limiting debate will expedite the consideration of those matters.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Ohio will endure the atmosphere of the Senate Chamber and my lame and impotent way of explaining a public matter, I shall endeavor to answer those two questions as I proceed. That is the sole purpose of my present address to the Senate.

I pass now from the composition of the committees of the Senate to some of the practices that we observe upon the Senate floor. After we have invoked the divine guidance and blessing, the Presiding Officer of the Senate announces that the Senate is ready to receive petitions and memorials, and immediately comes an avalanche of newspaper editorials, newspaper recitals of all kinds—important and unimportant, fugitive and permanent—and we are asked to admit to the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD comments on everything that has transpired, whether yesterday or during the last year.

Of course, that is contrary to the rule, as pointed out yesterday by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]; but it is unavailing to object. Why? Because if the Senator desires to illuminate the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the editorials and the comments of newspapers upon the various subjects, private and public, which may be current, he has only to wait his time and read them as a part of an unlimited debate. We have seen over and over again hours consumed in reading these fulminations of either compliment or denunciation which appear from day to day in the public press. I am not depreciating the public press; I think it is the greatest influence for both good and harm known to the civilization of the world; but I do not think there ought to be a privilege, on the part of the Senate, of any Senator either to encumber the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or tire and weary the Senate in endeavoring to give renewed publicity to these things.

This rush of newspaper wisdom being over, then Senators appear with letters and telegrams innumerable upon every subject under the sun, addressed to them personally, and which do not in any wise constitute an appeal or a petition to the Congress of the United States, and they are inserted in the RECORD. If objection is made, again a Senator, if he very much desires publicity for these things, takes occasion to read them or have them read into the RECORD in connection with a speech that he is making under the privilege of an unlimited consumption of time. Moreover these editorials and comments and telegrams and letters read in the presence of the Senate of course develop differences of opinion, and even though we be at the very threshold of our morning business a Senator will arise and begin to discuss a matter which has no more relation to any business in which the Senate is engaged than it has to do with the debates, if there are any, which are going on in the courts of the New Jerusalem.

It oftentimes happens that the entire morning hour is consumed in the discussion—I was about to say the frivolous and indefensible discussion—of matters thus thrust into public notice through this practice, which has gradually grown up and which is now so fortified that it can only be abolished by a positive rule. I assert that we neither help the country nor help ourselves by the continuation of this custom, which I have so meagerly and imperfectly attempted to describe.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I have not been an offender along the line that the Senator from Iowa is discussing, I feel that I may well offer an observation on that point. The fact is that nineteen-twentieths of what the Senator complains of is done in open violation of the rules of the Senate and can be cured by an enforcement of the rules by the Presiding Officer. If the Senator from Iowa was in the Chamber only a few days ago, he will remember that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, occupied about five minutes in reading what the rules of the Senate actually are regarding petitions. If those rules were observed, I honestly believe—I said nineteen-twentieths, but certainly nine-tenths of the time consumed in these irrelevant discussions in the morning hour would be saved.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume the Senator from New Hampshire did not hear the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I was called out of the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the observation with which I began my comment upon this practice I said that by far the greater part of these editorials and comments and letters and telegrams were offered against the rule, as has been stated by the Senator from Arizona; but I further said—and I repeat it, so that the Senator from New Hampshire may hear it—that if a Senator is insistent and really desires that this stuff shall go into the RECORD and receive publicity, he has but to await his occasion and, under the privilege of unlimited debate, he can read it all or have all of it read, and thus accomplish the purpose which he originally had in mind.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator—I was temporarily called from the Chamber and did not hear his first observations on this point—that I fear that a rule limiting debate will not meet this question. It is rarely ever that a Senator wants to read a paper or a clipping which would occupy more than an hour and a half; so that even if this rule is adopted it will not prevent him from doing that very same thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. It will prevent him from doing so if he has anything to say upon the matter under consideration. Of course if he has nothing to say upon the matter that is being debated, I agree that he might consume uselessly and wastefully a great deal of time in that way.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, the Senator from Iowa knows that Senators who desire to get that class of literature into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where it is embalmed forever and is never any good to anybody, will always be able to have an introduction of a few sentences on a question that is actually under debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have great hopes that the rule which has been proposed will have some corrective tendencies in that regard.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Iowa is talking about practical things, and I am in perfect accord with all that he has said concerning the abuses of the morning hour, but why not be literally practical and bring in a rule to correct that and not shut off debate in the Senate on pending questions?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose the Senator from Ohio knows that that has been tried.

Mr. HARDING. Well, does the Senator from Iowa mean to say that it is an impossibility?

Mr. CUMMINS. One who has been somewhat diligently at work upon these subjects for, now, 10 years, as I have been, and who has encountered the classical stone wall as often as I have encountered it in the Committee on Rules, is not very optimistic with regard to the probability of these things being changed, unless we can take a broad, comprehensive view of our office; unless we can secure a better and a truer conception of the thing or the things for which we are commissioned as Senators, and which we have sworn to do as well as our abilities will permit us to do them. I am reviewing this because these things are all parts of the same general scheme.

The man who looks upon the Senate of the United States as a mere point from which to declaim to the people of the United States upon all subjects and at all lengths, of course finds no objection to the practices that I have described or the rules which I have named. If you will examine your minds and think logically, as I know you will, before you vote, there is the real difference between those who are in favor of this rule and those who are against it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment until I state it. I have not yet clearly stated it.

My view of the functions of the Senate is to consider and to adopt or reject, after fair opportunity to debate, the measures which are proposed by the several Members of the body. Those who are opposed to the rule—at least, as I infer from the objections that have been made up to this time—believe that the chief function of Congress, or of the Senate, at least, is to organize itself into a superior Chautauqua and to be the agency for the distribution of their views upon all matters without regard to their relevancy or materiality to the subjects of discussion which are from time to time proposed. That is the difference between those who favor a limitation and those who do not.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator will permit me, I just took occasion to say on the floor that I cordially approved of all the Senator had said concerning the abuses of the morning hour, and I know the Senator will do me the justice to say that I have never once offended in that direction. In addition to not opposing the rule proposed, in a rather rambling discussion before the Senate the other day I said that after all the consciences of men must be the best guide for their procedure and service in the Senate. Certainly the Senator from Iowa does not pretend to say that a number of Senators who are opposing this rule are of the type against whom he is complaining—the so-called Chatauqua type—or those who use this opportunity to declaim themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio must understand me. I did not refer to the Chautauqua, as some Members of the Senate do, disparagingly; I think it has been one of the greatest influences for good and has accomplished more real reform in this country than has any other association of an altruistic character.

Mr. HARDING. Granting that, the Senator from Iowa will not be justified, even with that exalted view of the Chautauqua, in saying that men who oppose this rule want to use this Chamber for the promotion or the opportunity to promulgate theories and various propaganda because they are opposed to this rule, for I can cite to the Senator a number of Senators who have never once offended in that direction.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not said that any Senator desires to offend at any time; I do not believe he does. I have not said that any Senator who opposes the rule is conscious of that fundamental difference; but that is my judgment, my inference with regard to the thing which really separates those who are for the rule and those who are against it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to call the Senator's attention to a case that would oblige him to widen the latitude and function of Senators considerably from that which he has just stated. When the difficulty between Cuba and Spain arose right on our border, there was nothing but agitation that could get anywhere or do any good during the latter part of Mr. Cleveland's administration and the first part of the McKinley administration, and this Chamber and the other House spent a great deal of very useful time in informing the country as to real conditions down here on our border, within 90 miles of the American shore.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I myself went there and made a speech in the Senate on my return.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; the Senator from New Hampshire went there and returned and informed the Senate of what he had found. I went with him, but I never said a word after my return, although I perhaps knew as much about that situation as did the Senator from New Hampshire or the late Senator from Vermont, Mr. Proctor. Yet we could get no action here. The President had set his face against it. It was just and proper that our country's interest should be safeguarded on our border, and yet we were unable to do anything except to agitate the country, and it was agitated, agitated, and agitated here under the wide latitude of debate, until the late Senator from Vermont, Mr. Proctor, went down there of his own volition and came back here. His speech was a revelation of horror and brought the country to a proper understanding of the situation.

Now, the Senator from Iowa ought not to say that our chief function is to discuss bills that are pending in the other House and in the Senate. Our chief function is to inform the country and to keep ourselves informed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said that was the fundamental difference between those opposed to the rule and those who are for it. The Senator from Michigan has but repeated what he so eloquently said the other day—that, in his judgment, the chief function of Congress was not to legislate or to help to legislate for the country, but that it was to inform, to act as a pulpit from which the ministers of progress and of humanity could from day to day speak to the American people. He may be right about it, but I do not think so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Iowa does me too much honor. That thought did not originate with me at all; that was a quotation from Woodrow Wilson, who said that it was more important to have free discussion of these problems by the Senate than it was to have legislation. That was not my expression.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, Mr. President, it is exceedingly important to have free discussion. I do not know what Woodrow Wilson meant, and I do not attempt to interpret it; but I do know what the Senator from Michigan has just said, and he has just declared, that it is not the chief function of Congress to legislate for the American people, but that it is its chief function to inform the American people with regard to subjects of general interest.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I am not interrupting the Senator unduly——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I do not say, nor have I ever indicated in any fashion whatever, that it was not a valuable function for the Senate to inform the people with regard to matters of public interest. I think it is, and I, for one, would recoil from an effort to deny to the Senate or to the Members of the Senate that privilege.

The proposed rule does not deny that privilege. We have the entire morning hour, if we limit it to its just purposes and objects. Moreover, the proposed rule only applies to debate upon a bill or a resolution, and if the Senate desires to set apart one day in a week or two days in a week for the delivery of orations upon general matters for the edification, instruction, and inspiration of the people, it may do so. There is nothing in the proposed rule to prevent it. It will only be applicable and operative when there is a specific subject before the Senate for consideration and decision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the proposed rule had been a part of our code it could be said that I had rarely offended against it. In very few instances have I talked on any bill more than an hour and thirty minutes, which is the time the proposed new rule allows. I am afraid the Senator from Iowa sometimes has offended against it; but let that go for what it is worth.

Now, I wish to ask the Senator a frank question, which he can answer in his own way. Aside from the speech which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] made in presenting the last revenue bill, on which occasion, I think, he talked about eight hours—and we all listened to him with interest; I know I did, notwithstanding I was a member of the committee and had heard the testimony—aside from that speech, how many instances can the Senator cite from the beginning of this Congress—not during this session, but during this Congress—where any Senator has talked more than an hour and thirty minutes on any bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Very few; but it is not alone to correct long speaking by individual Senators that this rule is proposed; it is to facilitate and speed the transaction of business. The value of this proposed rule will lie in this, that if it is adopted, when Senators rise to speak upon a bill or a resolution or an amendment they will speak upon the subject before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not necessarily; the rule does not so provide.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think they will; and they will not be able to speak more than once, whereas now Senators, while they do not often speak more than an hour and thirty minutes upon any one occasion, speak on and on repeatedly; they rise a dozen times upon various questions. Under the proposed new rule they will be limited, and, after they have exhausted an hour and thirty minutes, they will be limited to 20 minutes upon amendments as they may be proposed.

I think the great evil that inheres in debates of the Senate is a failure on the part of Senators to speak upon the question that is shortly to be decided by a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but neither does the existing rule nor the proposed new rule meet that objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator differs from me in that respect. I believe the rule will have a strong and persuasive tendency to induce Senators to speak upon the very question that is about to be submitted to a vote. I think that is one of its great virtues, and constitutes a merit that is not to be ignored.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if, from his experience in the Senate of the United States, it is not his conviction that there has been very much more waste of time in the repetition of speeches, in making the same speech practically over and over again upon different occasions and to different portions of the audience of the Senate, than because of any abuse in the making of long speeches in the first instance?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the portion of the rule that would affect that practice I think is very good.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is also true. As I have just attempted to say in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, in my judgment the proposed rule will induce more real debate; it will elicit more information than is elicited at the present time under the unlimited privilege of speech, for the very reason that if a Senator has anything whatever to say upon the subject, if he has any interest in it, he will devote himself from the beginning to the thing of which he desires to convince his fellow Senators.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, if I may be permitted—and I think in debate I may be permitted to allude to the other House, an institution which I visit now and then—I will ask the Senator if he has observed that, although they have in that body limited debate and a previous question, the most important bills which come to this body are often voted upon by less than one-sixth of the membership of the House?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I can not discuss the proceedings of the other House.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, not the proceedings, but as a matter of general observation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can only answer the Senator from New Hampshire by saying that the rule which we now propose has no resemblance whatever to the procedure of the House of Representatives. It is true they have a limitation, but it is not the limitation that we propose, and it is not brought about in the way in which we propose to bring it about here. Under the proposed rule, when a bill or resolution is before the Senate every Senator may, if he desires to speak upon it before an amendment is proposed, consume one hour and a half. If he waits until after an amendment is proposed, he may consume an hour and 30 minutes, and as each amendment appears he may consume an additional 20 minutes. The Senator from New Hampshire knows that the House has no rule of that character or one that resembles it in any respect, so far as I am advised.

Mr. GALLINGER. The House has a rule limiting speeches to one hour, and no Member can speak longer than that unless he gets unanimous consent. I know that to be the fact, because I was a Member of that body myself.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; but the Senator from New Hampshire knows that practically all the important legislation of the House is considered and disposed of under a special rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not all of it; some of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I have been led to believe that the greater part of the important legislation there is considered and disposed of under a special rule which determines what the debate shall be——

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And it not only determines what the debate shall be, but who shall indulge in it, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet, notwithstanding that special rule, if the Senator will go to that body, he will find that they are operating under that special rule with perhaps 40 Members present out of a membership of over 400.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is very deplorable; but there seems to be no way of compelling the attendance either of the Members of the House or of the Members of the Senate. I have hoped that if we would limit debate as proposed in the rule the attendance might be a little larger than it is now. In fact, I can not understand the courage of the Senators who believe that the Senate is the radiating point for the intelligence of the country, and that our chief object in life is to furnish illumination for a dark and benighted land; I do not see how they can deliver these very long speeches upon general subjects with a half dozen or fewer Senators listening, but they do. Earnestly as I think that our legislative function is our chief function, I do not intend to take away from those who desire to indulge in it the other function which is so valued by some very eminent men.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator again——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not often offend against the propriety of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have been a Member of the House and of the Senate for 24 years, and I will venture the assertion that, except upon one occasion when the interest of my State was seriously involved, I have not taken 24 hours' time in 24 years' service in the Senate and House.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is one of the things that makes me marvel at the opposition of the Senator from Michigan. He is able to say all that he desires to say, and say it impressively and say it convincingly, within the time which we have specified in the proposed rule, and yet, apparently, he wants, for somebody else who has not made his appearance as yet, the opportunity to consume greater time and for some other purpose than the Senator from Michigan consumes his time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I appreciate the compliment the Senator from Iowa has paid me, and I think, perhaps, from the record that at least that part of it is due which refers to the fact that I have not consumed the time of the Senate unduly; but the thing I am laboring for is not that some other Senator who may want to offend may be accorded that privilege; the thing I am struggling to get into the minds of my associates is the power which now resides in a Senator to force for his State the consideration of questions of vital moment to the State, and which, under this plan and the plan of caucus dictation, he will be absolutely forbidden to enjoy.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will come to both of those subjects in a moment. I will say, in passing to another phase of the matter, that the only time I ever knew the Senator from Michigan to need more time than would be allowed by the proposed rule was an occasion, which I am sure he will remember with great regret, because, as brilliant and as eloquent as was his all-night and all-day speech at that time, it robbed him of his strength and health and required a year's recuperation before he was restored to that condition in which we now see him. Possibly that may influence me somewhat in my advocacy of this rule. I want to save Senators, if possible, from themselves.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, I think the Senator is doing a very praiseworthy work in that regard. My venerable friend [Mr. GALLINGER], who has passed 80 years and sits here before me, overexerted himself and has probably paid the penalty for it in more ways than one, while my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], always well informed, has probably hurt himself somewhat by the long speech which he made. That, however, was a case where there was not a majority of the Senate at any time for the bill, and we could not get the majority here to overthrow it. That was the trouble about it. There was never a majority of this Chamber for that bill, and only unlimited discussion gave time to summon absent Members to overthrow it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Michigan must speak for himself. The penalty I have paid is to keep on living, and I am going to keep on living a few years longer; and if ever a measure as obnoxious to me as that bill comes before the Senate while I am here, if the good Lord gives me the strength, I will talk all night again against it, unless this rule is invoked against me.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we all hope—and it is a very fervent hope, too—that the years of the Senator from New Hampshire may be many; but I hope, at any rate, that no occasion will arise in the future for such a draft upon his strength and vitality as was made upon it at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. So do I.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking about the merits of the bill that was being filibustered against then at all. I intend to refer to filibustering in a moment. I was only regretting that the discharge of a duty of that kind did sap the strength and shorten the years of the Senator from Michigan. Now, I repeat, I am wandering on rather aimlessly, and I think I am verifying all the evils of unlimited and unrestricted debate, for if I were under a limitation I would be able to direct my argument to the points and to the questions under discussion much more closely than I am able to do under existing circumstances.

I repeat that the limitation of this rule will have a strong, and, as I think, a conclusive tendency to direct debate to the question which the Senate is to decide. I can not imagine those who are interested in any pending bill or resolution expending their time and wasting their strength in observations which have no relation whatever to the matter about to be decided. It is my opinion, further, that an hour and a half of debate under a limitation of this character will furnish the country and the Senate more information upon the point to which the speech is directed than a four-hour dissertation would furnish.

There are, now and then, occasions when the time should be enlarged. I know that. There are times when the subject can not be exhausted and can not be adequately dealt with in an hour and thirty minutes, and I have no doubt that the instance referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] is one of them. Does the Senator from Ohio have any doubt that under the circumstances the time allotted to the Senator from North Carolina would be gladly enlarged? No; and if it comes to a choice, so far as I am concerned, between seeing a subject inadequately dealt with in an hour and thirty minutes and the privilege of unlimited debate everywhere and all the time upon every subject, then I must deprive myself of the joy of hearing the four-hour speech.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator's allusion to me justifies me in making a reply. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina would have been denied additional time, nor am I in disagreement with the Senator from Iowa in regard to unlimited debate on all subjects; but I call the Senator's attention, if he will pardon a personal allusion at this time, to the fact that he has himself just now given a demonstration of the impossibility of covering a subject properly under the proposed rule, because I note by the clock that the Senator from Iowa, speaking in this running debate as he has, answering questions freely and courteously as he has—and, which to my mind, adds very much to the debate—has consumed all the time allowed under the rule; and I take it that he has not yet completed his address, and necessarily requires more time to do the subject justice in the manner in which he is treating it.

That is one of the objections I have to the proposed rule. I think we ought to reach the abuses of the Senate in some other way.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I said a moment ago that I could have said all that I desired to say in much less time than an hour and thirty minutes, and if I had been operating or speaking under the proposed rule I would not have yielded as freely as I have yielded; and I believe that we have fallen into the habit of interruption that does not add anything to the value of debate. I agree that now and then a question properly directed will be helpful; but it is not helpful for a dozen Senators to be making their speeches at the same time, and that is what often occurs. I am not now referring to any interruption by the Senator from Ohio, because his interruptions have been brief and have been in the nature of interrogatories rather than discussion.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator has answered the question which I rose to address to him. I am glad to have his construction of the desirability of interrupted debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this rule will not accomplish all that its friends hope for it, of course, but it is not subject to the severe denunciation and criticism which have poured out upon it. It is absurd to assert that the limitation of debate upon any bill or resolution to 1 hour and 30 minutes is a deprivation of the right of speech. I have had some experience in public life, and in my judgment there are few occasions which demand a greater latitude in debate, and there are but few men who can consume more time profitably upon any subject that comes before the Senate. If it is desired to have a period of general discussion, I do not object to it, and this rule does not apply to it; but, believing that under the proposed limitation we will dispatch the business that we are called upon to do more rapidly and more effectually, I am in favor of the rule.

Now I come to the proof of my assertion that we are not doing the business of the country as we should do it.

I hold in my hand the calendar of bills which were undisposed of at the close of the Sixty-fourth Congress. It embraces 204 bills, joint resolutions, and other resolutions which had been considered by the committees of the Senate, reported by the committees, placed upon the calendar, and which were not in any way considered or disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why, Mr. President, one-half or three-quarters of the bills on the calendar are taken up with the distinct understanding that if there is any discussion they will go over.

Mr. CUMMINS. That does not modify or weaken the suggestion I have just made, that when the Sixty-fourth Congress closed it left behind it upon the calendar bills that had been in the main recommended for passage by the committees of Congress, that had not been considered by the Senate at all. I assert that a legislative body with a record of that kind behind it has no great reason to be proud of its career. I do not know what these bills are. No Senator knows what they are, I assume, but they are bills introduced by some Member of the House or of the Senate which were referred to the committees and reported for action to the Senate. I should be glad if some Member of the Senate would give me some good or reasonable excuse for the failure of the Senate to dispose in some way or other of the work of these committees.

Senators, I can not remember a time when the Senate has undertaken to consider the calendar under Rule VIII, even. I may be wrong about that, but I do not recall any occasion of that kind. Whenever the proposal is made to consider bills on the calendar, some Senator rises and proposes a unanimous-consent agreement to take up unobjected bills on the calendar; and the result is that we plume ourselves upon our great efficiency, and herald our work to the country at large as being complete and good, and yet we must either receive unanimous consent to take up a bill on the calendar or it perishes in the archives of the body which so boastfully and so repeatedly declares its exalted station and its mighty work. I do not want it to be understood that I am disparaging the Senate, or criticizing the Senate or the Senators, because all of this comes about through the fact that we cling to antiquated, obsolete, unjust rules which have been imposed upon us by our forefathers, who knew nothing about the work we are called upon to do, and could not even dream of the development which brings about the legislation which is proposed to the Congress at this time.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator's remarks are quite justified.

Mr. CURTIS and Mr. HARDING addressed the Chair.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, does not the Senator know that any Senator could move to take up any bill on the calendar, and get it up, and pass it, the same as this resolution has been taken up?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator ask that question seriously?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I refuse to answer it. Why, the Senator from Kansas must assume that I have some intelligence, although his question seems to deny it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not want to reflect upon the Senator's intelligence, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it seems to me the Senator has done so.

Mr. CURTIS. A few years ago I heard a statement similar to that made by the Senator from Iowa made on the floor of the Senate; and I asked the Senator, whose seat was near mine, why he did not move to take up his bill. He pursued that course, and the bill was passed; and the same thing could be done now on measures having merit.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must refuse to discuss any proposal of that kind. I know something about the rules of the Senate, and I am sure the Senator from Kansas knows them, also.

I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I quite agree with the statement which the Senator from Iowa has made concerning the unfinished calendar. I note that we have a calendar before us now containing some 75 measures.

Mr. CUMMINS. One hundred.

Mr. HARDING. Well, 100; I have not counted them accurately. Does the Senator from Iowa make the claim that that condition exists because of the rules of the Senate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HARDING. Let me remind the Senator——

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to indulge in a discussion with the Senator from Ohio, but I shall be very glad to answer any question which he may wish to propound.

Mr. HARDING. All right. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa—if I can put it in the form of a question—why the Senate two weeks ago, we will say, should not have given, under the rules, the time from Thursday until adjournment on Saturday night to the consideration of and action upon these measures instead of adjourning and doing nothing?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know why.

Mr. HARDING. My point is that the rules are not responsible for the neglect; it is the application of the Senate to its work.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the reason for this condition is, first, because we do not give sufficient attention to the business of the Senate in committee, and, second, because we use too much time in the sessions of the Senate in the consideration of the bills which are considered. There is no other reason for this condition. We can not excuse ourselves in that way. The Senators work hard enough. They can not distribute themselves more generally or effectually than they do. I am not suggesting that any Senator lacks in industry or fidelity to his work, but I am trying to prove that we spend too much of our time upon some bills, and the result is that we have no time to expend upon a great many other bills which may not be of as much importance as those considered, but which ought to receive the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator let me take just a moment to point out the trouble? I will not be more than a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then, if I yield, I hope the Senator will not say I am violating the rule that I am trying to have adopted.

Mr. HARDING. I want the Senator to have unlimited time for discussion. This is the difficulty: The procedure of the Senate is, of course, dictated by the majority. So soon as an important pending measure is out of the way the leader of the majority makes the motion that determines the action of the Senate. When a great appropriation bill or some other important measure is completed a motion comes from the majority to recess or adjourn to the next day or the next Monday, whatever may be the apparent wish of the Senate, and with perfect indifference we pass up the bills that are on the calendar; but that is not because of any rule which is preventing their consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course I realize that I can not convince the Senator from Ohio. I am simply endeavoring to give my own view of the matter. I think Senators work to the limit of their capacity. I do not think they could safely devote more hours to the public service than they now devote; but I am trying to show that we spend too much time upon some things, leaving none for other things that may not be of as great importance, but which are, after all, of concern to the localities and to the Senator from which or from whom they come.

At this time we have 101 bills or resolutions upon the calendar, and before this Congress shall have expired I venture to say that we will have as many as were on the calendar at the expiration of the Sixty-fourth Congress. We ought to do something that will enable us to pass upon these bills which have been reported by the committees, and which have consumed their time. If we are devoting all the time that we should to the public affairs, then there is but one conclusion, and that is that we must limit the time that we consume upon the bills that are considered and passed or rejected, in order that we may give some time to the others.

Mr. President, that is not all. There were introduced in the Senate in the Sixty-fourth Congress 8,334 bills, 221 joint resolutions, 34 concurrent resolutions, and 387 Senate resolutions. In the main these bills and joint resolutions, at least, were referred to the committees of the Senate. Each one of these bills was introduced by a Senator who, if he is an honest man—and I assume that every Senator is an honest man—believed that it ought to become the law of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He could not get his colleagues to believe that.

Mr. CUMMINS. He never had a chance to get his colleagues to believe it or disbelieve it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because they would not listen to his discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. These bills were referred to the various committees of the Senate, and not 10 per cent of them were ever even read by the members of the committees to which they were referred, nor were they considered in any way whatsoever. I think it may be safely asserted that the greater number of these bills would, if considered, meet with disfavor. That is probably true; but what do you think of a situation in which substantially nine-tenths of the bills which are introduced by Members of the Senate are never even read by members of the committee to which they are referred?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa has been in intimate touch with legislative bodies in his public service in his own State. Is it not true that that is the story of every State and Federal assembly in the world?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not the usual story of the State from which I come. There have been occasions on which that has been true. I shall not detain the Senate by describing why that was true. It is enough to say that it was no great credit to the State. But even if it were true in my own State, and even if it is true in the State of Ohio, there is no reason why it should be true in the Senate of the United States, unless it is beyond the physical and mental capacity of Senators to become familiar with these bills and either reject or adopt them.

What a tribute it is to individual Senators to give them the privilege of introducing proposals for legislation and then to deny to them the subsequent process of legislation. Now, the committees are not to blame. I happen to be a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it may be fairly said to be one of the important committees of the Senate. We have at the present time a calendar comprising a very large number of bills, I think nearly 200, possibly more, and we have not had a chance since I became a member of that committee to consider that calendar in the sense of endeavoring to pass upon the various bills which have been introduced and referred to us. We meet, ordinarily, at 11 o'clock. We adjourn, in order to comply with our obligations in the Senate, at 12 o'clock. It is utterly impossible for the committee to do what it ought to do within any such time. I desire to say for the chairman of the committee [Mr. CULBERSON] that there is no Senator of my acquaintance in my experience who is more faithful, more diligent, or who tries more constantly to dispose of the bills which have been referred to the committee, but it is not possible for him nor is it possible for the remaining members of the committee to do what we ought to do within the time which is allotted to us, and I assume that the truth which I have stated in regard to the Committee on the Judiciary is equally true of the other important committees of the Senate.

What is the remedy? The remedy is to shorten the sessions of the Senate and to enlarge or extend the sessions of the committees. There is no other remedy. But it is impossible to shorten the sessions of the Senate unless we put some kind of reasonable and fair limitation upon the debate that shall occur upon pending measures, and unless we are determined to use the morning hour in the way in which it ought to be used and for the purpose which the rules designed in establishing it.

Mr. President, we have introduced in this Congress in the Senate substantially 5,000 bills and resolutions. They have been referred to committees, and they are now pending before committees, and I venture the prediction that when this Congress will expire these committees will not have considered 10 per cent of the bills, and will not know whether they are good or ill, whether they should be passed or should not be passed. The truth is that under the present rule of unlimited debate and other practices which result in the waste I have attempted to describe there are just two kinds of bills that can be considered. One are the superlatively important bills—the bills which under present conditions the administration regard as essential to the conduct of the war or to the general welfare—I am content to describe them as bills of superlative importance.

The other class is composed of bills which can be passed by unanimous consent. None others can be considered in the Senate at this time under the rules we have, and none others are considered. That is the reason we have a calendar such as we have. That is the reason, or one of the reasons, why the Senate is brought into disrepute throughout the United States, because it can not under its present organization take up and consider the bills of great importance, but which do not concern all the people of the country. I have bills before the Judiciary Committee and on this calendar for which it is utterly impossible for me to secure consideration simply for the reason that there is some objection to them and because I can not convince my fellow Senators that the life of the Republic is involved in their consideration.

If Senators can find any abundant material for pride in that situation, they are more diligent in their search and more successful, too, than I have been. I think it is a reproach to the Senate and a great misfortune to the people of the country that we do not divide our time so that we can successfully perform the objects for which this body was organized.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator has been so polite——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. HARDING. I dislike to interrupt him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Only I want to ask the Senator that it may not form any ground for an accusation hereafter that I violated a rule that I am endeavoring to support.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator is in a felicitous humor. I have been following the Senator pretty closely in his argument. Am I correct in my inference that the Senator in nowise considers this as a war necessity?

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator wait until a little later? I have already spoken 10 or 15 minutes upon that subject.

Mr. HARDING. I am sorry I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be glad to repeat it, but I should like to finish the argument I have in hand.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me one brief interruption? Perhaps I have offended too often in asking the Senator to yield. He has been very courteous.

This multiplicity of bills, of course, is an evil in more than one respect. It exhausts print paper and ink and takes time in the Government Printing Office to produce them for our examination. There is no doubt about that, but has the Senator made an analysis of the relative number of bills that are in the document room and in the committee rooms of the body that has limited debate as compared with those in this body which has unlimited debate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that limiting debate will probably not relieve us from this incubus of a flood of bills.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is one of the things that will help us. The Senator from New Hampshire must understand that I am not asserting that upon the passage of this rule we would enter upon a millennium of legislation and of legislative practice. There are a great many things which, in my opinion, ought to be done in order to bring about a satisfactory condition, and this is only one of them. I have contented myself with endeavoring to point out why I think this rule, together with other changes that ought to be made, would have a tendency to a better and a speedier disposition of the public business.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. In answer to the question just propounded by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], if the Senator will pardon me, I made some inquiry of a number of individuals who have made some little investigation, and they state that the Senate passes more bills session by session under its rules than the House does under its cloture, previous question, and tyrannous and oppressive rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. I regard the suggestion of the Senator from Utah as somewhat irrelevant to my discussion. It is another instance of some of the evils of interruption. It contravenes nothing that I have said, and I am now compelled to pause and point out again why the fact which has been stated by the Senator from Utah—and I have no doubt it is a fact if he has examined it and so declares—has nothing to do with the argument that I am making. I can conceive how a body of men with no debate at all might not pass any bills or consider any bills. I am not asserting that the limitation upon debate alone will secure the disposition of these bills, but I do say that if we were to limit our debate we would have more time in the committees and we would have more time for the consideration of more bills in the Senate. The fact that the House of Representatives does not dispose of its business under what the Senator calls a cloture does not militate, I think, against the argument that I am making.

Mr. President, I come now to just a moment's reference to the position taken by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. He is opposed to this rule because he believes it is wise to retain the privilege of consuming time in debate solely for the purpose of preventing a vote or a disposition of the pending question. In other words, to use the common language which describes that proceeding, he is in favor of retaining the right to filibuster.

There is a difference of opinion about this, Mr. President. I do not want to be understood as being dogmatic upon it. I understand perfectly that there is room for a difference of opinion because I see honest, upright men who are in favor of conducting the Government upon that basis.

Now, for myself, I am opposed to filibustering. I do not believe it is consistent with free institutions or a free Government. The fundamental principle of free institutions is the rule of control of the majority, and I think that the privilege of preventing a vote by unlimited discussion and other parliamentary practices after there has been a fair and reasonable debate devoted to the illumination and exploration of the subject itself is almost as indefensible as it would be to gather a mob and prevent the electors of America from deciding the political questions that are involved upon an election day. It might just as well be urged that those electors who fear, who believe that a majority was determined to elevate to the Presidency a man whose administration would be inimical to the best interests of the Republic, and that therefore there should be no decision, and they should postpone it in some fashion or other until these people had given the subject a sober, second thought and had come to their senses, and accordingly avoid in the manner I have suggested the ultimate political decision involved in a campaign or in an election.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield,

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course I have the highest respect for the Senator from Iowa and his great ability. I do not want to ask him any question that would be in any degree embarrassing.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, he can not. Do not hesitate on that account.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, I should like to ask the Senator whether he approves of the use of unlimited discussion as used by the late former Senator Burton, or his own colleague, upon the river and harbor bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no hesitation whatever in answering that so long as the rule of the Senate permits the use of debate for that purpose it is not for me to censure an individual Senator or a group of Senators for exercising the privilege, but——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Wait a minute. But it is a false theory of public life, if we accept the principle that in a country like ours a majority shall adopt the laws which are to control and to govern us, and then, after the people who are to decide, whoever they may be, are informed by the most complete debate of which the subject is possible, to prevent that decision by any means, I care not what the means are, is in repugnance to our institutions. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if during his experience here he has ever seen the Senate or Senators engaged in a filibuster which met his approval?

Mr. CUMMINS. I engaged in a filibuster once.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly, and I followed the Senator with the greatest pleasure through his argument.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not censure myself for so doing. I endeavored to prevent the action of the Senate several years ago with respect to fixing the date for determining the validity of the election of William Lorimer until it would also fix a time to vote upon what was then known as the tariff commission bill. I am not conscious of having committed a wrong any more than those who joined in the attempt to prevent a vote on the river and harbor bill can be conscious of committing a wrong. They committed no wrong. They simply obeyed the law of their country and took advantage of the rules of the Senate, and I think they justified themselves, and I think the country approved what they did. I do not doubt that now and then the effort to prevent the decision by a majority will receive the approval of the country. Now and then the murder of a good man might result in good, because it awakened a spirit which the assassination of martyrs always awakens. But that does not change the principle. We ought to be willing to abide by the majority, and in my judgment the public good will be better served if after fair and reasonable debate the majority is allowed to express its decision than though it is prevented and postponed by a recourse to various devices merely for the purpose of consuming time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will allow me again, I do not disapprove of the filibuster which was undertaken by the Senator's colleague, although at the time it seemed to me that it was hardly justifiable. I have changed my view upon it, because as the result of the exercise of that tremendous senatorial power, now residing in every Senator in this body, the entire system of river and harbor appropriations has been remodeled and great good has come from the exercise of that arbitrary senatorial right. When you have foresworn yourselves from using such a right, you have deprived yourselves of one of the greatest weapons of senatorial service.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, Mr. President, it is a privilege which many people regard as exceeding valuable. I do not. I believe that this country will in the end have better laws and they will be more wisely and justly administered if the majority, whether in the primary election which determines who our executive officers shall be or in the secondary election occurring in the Senate which determines what our laws shall be, shall have an opportunity to express their will and carry that will into effect.

Mr. HARDING. I do not want the Senator to think that I am captious. I merely want to call his attention to the fact that there must be a moment when one can reasonably oppose majority rule, because we turn to the record of vote on Monday, when the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] offered an amendment to the Borah amendment to the rule providing that a majority should be permitted to decide, and the Senator from Iowa voted against majority control.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing the Senator from Ohio shall experience all the pleasure he can find in that situation. Of course, he is indulging in pleasantry about it, and I do not envy him the pleasure he feels.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Mr. President, for a great man, a man of wide experience and wide thought, to make a suggestion of that kind astonishes me, if the interruption is a serious one. The Constitution of the United States provides for instances in which there must be more than a majority. Our rules provide for instances in which there must be more than a majority. Does the Senator from Ohio think that when I am arguing in favor of the general rule of the majority it is necessary in order to be consistent that I must enumerate all the instances in which there may and ought to be exceptions to that rule? He certainly does not contend that.

Mr. HARDING. No; I said there were specific exceptions to the majority rule. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The exceptions to the majority rule are those in which the public interest requires more than a majority to carry into effect the public will. There are no exceptions so far as I know—they do not occur to me at this moment at any rate—in which it is justifiable to prevent the expression of the public will, whether it is necessary that two-thirds or three-fourths or a majority shall control in order to be the public will. I think there is a very great difference between those two things, and I can not perceive any inconsistency in the position I have taken in behalf of the rule of the majority and the fact that in some instances in order either to make laws or establish foreign relations more than a majority is required to express the public conclusion.

Mr. President, I have already consumed more time than I had any thought of consuming or than I would have consumed had I not engaged in this very delightful interchange of opinions with my brother Senators. I have been very glad to do it, because when questions are put in the proper spirit if I can answer them I am always glad to do it, and if I can not answer them I am always glad to admit that.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. A moment ago the Senator was discussing the matter of bills that have been introduced and the action or want of action that was taken on the bills. Only a few years ago this question was a live issue in the Senate. I took occasion at that time to have an analysis made of what happened to bills in the two Houses of Congress. It will take me but a moment to state the result of my investigation.

During that Congress there were introduced into the Senate 8,754 bills, of which 848 bills were passed, being almost 10 per cent of the total number. That was in the Senate. In the other House there were introduced 29,278 bills, of which 548 were passed, or 2 per cent, under the rule of limited debate—10 per cent in the Senate, 2 per cent in the House.

During that same Congress the House concurrent resolutions sent to the Senate were 27, of which the Senate passed 26, being 96 per cent. The Senate at the same time sent 26 concurrent resolutions to the House, of which 20 were passed by the House, or 77 per cent. So during that Congress, which was the Sixty-second Congress, the RECORD shows that the Senate passed five times as large a proportion of the bills that were introduced as did the other House.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad the Senator brought that to the attention of the Senate, but that does not change the situation. We adjourn at the end of every session with a very large volume of work undone. Every Congress expires with a great number of bills which ought to be considered by the Senate unconsidered, and a much larger number before the committees without attention, which ought to have been given attention. I have endeavored to show that the rule which is now proposed would have a tendency at least, together with other revisions which ought to occur, to bring about a better and more efficient state of affairs.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has referred to the very delightful interchange of opinions which we have been having in this debate. It seems to me that this rule, if applied, would prevent that very delightful interchange of opinions.

I have had the clerks in the library make a list of the speeches that have been made in this body from April 4, 1917, to April 8, 1918, and I find that there have been 188 speeches made during that time which have consumed an hour or more of time. This list may not be absolutely accurate. The way they went about it was to take an average. They assumed that a page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains 1,700 words, and that, on an average, it would take 20 minutes to deliver those 1,700 words. Taking that as an average, as I say, there have been 188 speeches which have consumed an hour's time. There have been 75 speeches during that time which have consumed an hour and one-half. The additional time over the hour and one-half in all of those 75 speeches would be 68½ hours for the entire year.

It does not seem to me possible that this rule, changing all of the ancient principles and practices of the Senate, should be adopted simply to take care of those 68½ hours.

In the debate last summer on the war-revenue bill, which took up nearly seven weeks' time, 33 speeches were made which took over an hour's time; 11 speeches were made which took over an hour and one-half. I assume that one of the principal reasons for the proposed change in the rules is to take care of the debate which is coming on the next war-revenue bill. In the last war-revenue bill it would have saved us only 11½ hours if the rule had been changed. Therefore, I say that the object of the rule is not primarily to take care of long speeches but to prevent the debate and interchange of opinion between Senators.

I have here a list showing the number of speeches and by what Senators delivered, which have consumed over an hour and over an hour and one-half, and I shall be glad to give any Senator who desires to do so the opportunity to examine the list.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am generally very glad indeed to follow the lead of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and to accept, almost without demur, his dictum upon any particular matter relating to procedure before this body. In this instance, however, for reasons which to me seem excellent—indeed, important—which to others may seem quite attenuated, I can not follow his lead, and I can not support the particular rule that is proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

I may say, Mr. President, that to a man of rapidity of utterance and facility of expression a rule such as that proposed by the Senator from Alabama under ordinary circumstances would be of little consequence and of no importance. If the times were other than they are, if the peculiar circumstances which surround us were those which in the past may have surrounded the United States Senate, I might, with the same eagerness that is evinced by some who speak longest and some who attend least, vote for this particular rule; but with the view that I have of the kaleidoscopic changes that are occurring in our Government, with the vision that I have, such as it may be, of what may transpire in the future, with the possibilities of the months to come after the transmuting of this Government, I could not in any degree or in any measure by any rule or by any law shackle this particular body, or any individual in it, or do aught which would militate in that struggle which possibly the future holds for us and which may follow the great conflict in which we are engaged.

I recognize, Mr. President, that it is popular to abuse the United States Senate. I recognize that there has been an insidious poison for many months, and perhaps some years past, instilled into our people until—and I say it with regret, of course, and I say it, indeed, with resentment—there is to-day in the popular mind something of a contempt for this body. Not only is this contempt in the popular mind instilled, as I believe insidiously in the past, but there is a contempt to-day which every Senator upon this floor recognizes, thinly veiled, in nearly every department of the Government for the United States Senate. Again and again bills are presented here, and we are told that a particular department has prepared these bills carefully and we are asked why debate them, why delay in examination or investigation? There is indignation and resentment in many departments of the Government at the very thought that the United States Senate or the other House of Congress should perform their duty and should investigate or should discuss or debate measures that are presented to them. That sort of thing has grown and grown with the days, until to-day—I say it with a resentment that can not be less than that of any other Senator upon this floor—apparently the United States Senate has fallen from its high estate.

But in this day, Mr. President, there is something else that I see as well. I see that we have transmuted in the past 14 months our Republic; I see that upon which we have prided ourselves in the past, that of which we have boasted in the past, that which we have taken unto ourselves and loved during all of the years that this Nation has been a nation—has been transmuted under the exigency and the emergency of war, and rightly so, into an autocracy as powerful as any autocracy upon the face of the earth. Rightly so, I say, because the first, the prime, and the paramount obligation resting upon the American people is to win this war. I recognize that, and there is naught you would ask me to do I would not do for that desideratum and for the purpose of accomplishing in this conflict that which we have set out to do—ultimately destroying brutal militarism by final complete and conclusive victory.

But, Mr. President, there is another day coming as well, and in transmuting our Government temporarily in the fashion that we have done, there is no reason why any man of wisdom, of foresight, with an atom of statesmanship, should not prepare against that day when it will be his duty and his obligation as great as is the obligation to-day to win this war, to bring back this Republic into its own, and make this Government as it has been in all the years of the past. It is because I am thinking of that day, Mr. President, because I have before me the time when it will be necessary for you and for me to make the fight for democracy in this land, that I would not put the slightest clog upon the action of the United States Senate or of the House of Representatives or upon the action of any Senator in the United States Senate or any Member of the House of Representatives.

They may indeed inveigh against this body; it may be possible by instilling the poison in the fashion that it has been instilled to take the due meed of confidence from this body that the people have in the past held it. It may be that these departments of Government, with their thinly-veiled contempt for the men who are supposed to represent the people in the Congress of the United States, may be acting wholly justifiably; but I believe, Mr. President, just as firmly as I believe to-day when we are debating what in peace times might be an inconsequential matter—I believe that in the last analysis finally this Chamber will witness the struggle for the democracy of our forefathers and the perpetuity of those institutions which we have cherished for more than a century and which we must cherish for all time to come if the Nation is to remain the democracy we have loved. That day when it comes will find this body and the individual Members of it, I know, not unworthy. It is that day, as we tighten up in what we have been doing in the last year, as we centralize more and more, as we yield again and again in order that we may meet this awful brutal foe abroad—it is that day when we must finally face the ultimate issue and restore this Government to its pristine purity and its pristine glory and to its original character—it is this day I guard against now by permitting not the entering wedge in this body and with its Members, so that they could not do fully, freely, wholly, absolutely, and successfully their duty when the day shall come.

You may think I am talking more or less extravagantly concerning that day; you may think that I am unduly alarmed. Perhaps I am. Perhaps I deal only with a remote possibility; but if I deal, Mr. President, with a possibility at all, if I deal, indeed, with a contingency which may occur, then I think that everyone of us should be the more careful to guard every privilege that attaches to this body, every privilege that attaches to every single Member of this body.

Recently there have been events transpiring which show how we have transmuted our Government. To one or two I desire briefly to refer.

I refer, first, to the story of Gen. Leonard Wood. I refer to that story because I think it illustrates in a degree that little else could illustrate just how far we have gone in this Government transmution and just how little regarded are now the Congress of the United States and even the people of the United States. I have selected, in order that the expressions may not be mine, expressions from various newspapers of all shades of political faith, newspapers in which I may or may not at all believe, but newspapers which represent constituencies and which represent all kinds of politics and all sorts of beliefs.

I read to you first from the New York World:

The news that Gen. Leonard Wood is to be kept in this country, while the division whose training he is completing will go abroad under his second in command, will give every fair-minded man a bad taste in the mouth.

Gen. Wood has undoubtedly been offensive in his attitude toward the administration and the military high command. But that aggressive antagonism should have been punished either by court-martial or not at all—certainly not by permanent internment in the United States.

Gen. Wood may not be the genius that many of his supporters consider him, but well over 100 generals have gone abroad, and there must certainly be some among this number with whose military talents those of Gen. Wood can favorably compare.

I read next from the New York Times:

Ex-President Taft has been and is a loyal and earnest supporter of his successor in this war and has never wavered for a moment in that loyalty. He is beyond the suspicion of partisan motives when he offers the grave and well-considered suggestion to the administration, which we reprint to-day from the Philadelphia Public Ledger. When Mr. Taft says that "the country is seriously disappointed that Gen. Wood has not been permitted to go abroad with the division which he has been training," the President and Secretary Baker may rely absolutely on the sincerity of Mr. Taft's concern and the accuracy of his information.

The country does not know why Gen. Wood was permitted to train a division for service abroad, to make his preparations to go abroad with it, and was then suddenly halted on the eve of sailing and ordered to stay at home. No information has been given it. It has heard rumors that the order was given for political reasons and counter-reasons; that it was given because of the jealousy of other officers. It does not know what to believe, and it is undoubtedly disturbed. Whether it is the administration's duty to itself to make known the real reason, is a question for the administration to decide, but it is obvious that it is the administration's duty to the country.

If the administration's reason is good, it may decide to bear unjust imputations in silence, regarding that as the nobler part. But it is not merely a matter of the feelings of the administration. It is a serious matter concerning the country. For the uncontradicted rumor that political grudges, personal spite, or military jealousy is responsible for the withholding of any capable officer from giving the country the service it needs from him will have a bad effect on the country's morale. It will spread doubt, chill enthusiasm. The administration can not permit such a chilling and disheartening suspicion to spread among the people at a time so critical as this. It owes it to the people to dissipate this doubt and depression by giving its facts and its reasons.

"The consideration that dominates every other now," said the President last Monday, "and makes every other seem trivial and negligible is the winning of the war." Nothing that tends to spread doubt, discouragement, or suspicion should be permitted. The administration should stifle these things at the beginning by giving frankly the reasons which governed it in the action it took regarding Gen. Wood.

I next read from the New York Tribune:

We can win the war without Gen. Wood. In that sense his domestic internment may not be in itself a calamity. But we can not win the war unless the Government is willing and anxious to utilize all of our resources in materials, ideas, and men. Gen. Wood may or may not be the greatest military commander we have. Our military genius is yet potential. We can only be sure that we have no more of it, actual and potential, than we shall need. Gen. Wood is bigger than any task he has yet undertaken. Nobody knows how much bigger he can be. Is not that reason enough why he should have the utmost development in active service? In any case, for a man of Gen. Wood's ability to be rejected for personal reasons is almost unendurable.

From the Philadelphia North American I quote the following:

After a prolonged visit to the fighting front and the allied capitals last winter, Representative MEDILL MCCORMICK, of Illinois, gave to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs a detailed statement of what he had learned. The official report of his testimony contained the following passage:

"I spent three hours with Premier Lloyd-George on the day we got the last bad news from Italy. He talked very freely. He was especially anxious to know what had happened to Leonard Wood, where he had been buried, why he was not in Washington or Paris. He wanted him on the allied war council as our representative. He was very insistent upon that point."

Mr. Lloyd-George and Gen. Foch and others who were concerned about this matter now have a belated but complete answer to their questions. "What happened to Leonard Wood" was that he fell under the displeasure of the administration by advocating preparedness when the policy was "keeping the country out of war"; the penalty for that offense is an order depriving him of an overseas command; the place of "burial" selected was an office in San Francisco, 6,000 miles from the battle front; but this sentence has been commuted to service as head of a training camp in Kansas.

Last Sunday Gen. Wood reviewed the division of efficient troops he had fashioned from raw levies, which he had been assigned to command in France, only to be peremptorily recalled on the eve of embarkation. Erect and impassive he saluted the colors as they went by. Then, as the last company swung past he turned to the division officers grouped around him and said a few words of farewell:

"* * * I had hoped very much to take you over to the other side. In fact, I had no intimation, direct or indirect, of any change of orders until we reached here the other night. The orders have been changed, and I am to go back to Camp Funston. There isn't anything to be said; the only thing to do is to do the best we can—all of us—to win the war. * * * Good luck and God bless you!"

So he went away this man who wears the ribbon of the Medal of Honor, who has been Chief of Staff of the United States Army and is considered throughout all Europe the foremost American soldier—to train more recruits for others to lead into battle. Again, and always, he will do his best and say nothing. Washington breathes easier, because the case of Leonard Wood is "a closed incident." But is it?

Oh, Mr. President, the cruelest thing in all this world is the humiliation of a brave spirit. If it were necessary to humiliate a brave spirit as Leonard Wood was humiliated, for the love of God ought not the people of the United States be told of it? I criticize no man; I am saying naught of hostility to any administration; I recognize the right of the Commander in Chief to select whomsoever he pleases for official command; but there is one thing, Mr. President, that the American people have a right to ask at this juncture—one thing, Mr. President, that I have a right to ask and every other man has a right to ask whose blood is in France to-day, and that is, Why do you keep out of the fighting line a man we believe to be a soldier of ability and intrepidity, a soldier who could render valiant service in this hour? In asking that I do not ask that he be permitted to go, I do not ask that any decision be changed; but I say, in this democracy of ours, why should not the people of the United States be entitled to some explanation? And I say further, Mr. President, without the possibility of contradiction of the fact, that to-day there is not a government upon the face of the earth that would treat its ranking general, or its former ranking general, in the fashion that Gen. Wood has been treated without an explanation unto its people.

Thus, Mr. President, I turn to other reports from other papers of like sort, and instead of reading them, if there be no objection, I ask that I may insert the five or six line editorial of the Baltimore Sun, the brief word of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, that of the Kansas City Star, and that in the Fresno Republican, of the State of California. I ask as well that I be permitted to insert the article of President Taft, which appeared in the New York Times and to which reference has already been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from California asks unanimous consent for the insertion in the RECORD of the matter indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Baltimore Sun also joined in the demand for light: "Gen. Wood may not be entitled to an explanation, but the country certainly is. * * * On every account the matter should be cleared up authoritatively and at once. The people of the United States have a right to know the causes that have led to what looks like a case of public humiliation for an officer of high rank."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch: "The public has a right to know what is behind the sudden determination to keep Gen. Leonard Wood at home."

The Kansas City Star: "If there are military reasons why Gen. Wood should be detained on home service some hint of them from Washington would not be out of place. Unless such explanation is forthcoming a very harmful impression is exceedingly likely to prevail."

Fresno Republican: "When the war broke out Gen. Leonard Wood was the ranking, and by common consent the ablest general in the American Army. He was in command of the principal division in the Northwest. Promptly he was transferred to what was then the least important division in the South. The pretext was given out that this was to be the principal division, because the most soldiers were to be trained in it. They were—but Gen. Wood was not given command of their training. He was sent in due course to France, like other officers, as a detached observer, and was wounded there. Returning, he was in command of the Eighty-ninth Army Division, as well as senior officer in the Army. That division is about to go to France. So yesterday an order was issued detaching him from command of it and ordering him to San Francisco, to the perfunctory command of the Western Division. Which means, of course, that it is the definite policy of the administration that Gen. Wood, the senior officer of the American Army, shall be bottled up for the period of the war.

"'It is not the custom of the department to explain orders to officers,' says Secretary Baker. Perhaps not. In the case of ordinary orders to ordinary officers, it is not the custom of war departments anywhere. But in the case of such extraordinary orders as this, to officers of the first rank, it is the custom of the French and British Governments to make explicit explanations indeed, and we predict that before he is finished Secretary Baker will find it advisable to establish a similar custom here.

"'Politics is adjourned,' said President Wilson yesterday. Yet if this act is not politics, there must be some other reason for it, which the American people are entitled to know. The political explanation, if it is politics, is perfectly obvious. An administration venting petty personal and political spleen would be expected to act toward Gen. Wood in exactly this way. Unless some other explanation is given, American public suspicion will make this explanation. The best way to confirm the suspicion will be for Secretary Baker to continue his present attitude of contemptuous silence. If there is any other explanation, the American people are entitled to have it. And if it is an explanation which would compel Gen. Wood, in self-respect, to resign indignantly from the Army, that would be no loss. He is permitted to do nothing now which lesser men could not do just as well."

President Taft: "Gen. Wood is one of the ablest men of the Army. He has rendered long and effective service as a general officer. A graduate of the Harvard Medical School, he entered the Army as an assistant surgeon, and became a captain and regular surgeon. He received a congressional medal of honor for his service 'as medical officer and in the line' in an Indian campaign. He was colonel of the Rough Riders, and was made a brigadier general of Volunteers. He cleaned up Santiago, and was made Governor General of Cuba. He became major general in the Regular Army on August 8, 1902.

"Those who know him know that Gen. Wood is a natural soldier; that, though he entered the Army as a surgeon, his whole life has been devoted to military matters and their study. He has given much attention to the German system of military science. Wherever he has been in command he has earned the sincere respect of those under him and stimulated in them an admirable esprit de corps. He has been charged with undue ambition and a willingness to secure advancement at the expense of others; but intense energy in the line of his duty and highly efficient service were the means by which he secured promotion. This was true of his service in Cuba, in the Philippines, and as Chief of Staff.

"Just before the present war Gen. Wood was as much concerned at our lack of preparation for possible war as Lord Roberts was over the lack of preparation in England. Both advocated conscription, both universal service, and both have been vindicated by the event. When Gen. Wood was relieved as Chief of Staff, in April, 1914, he was sent to command the Eastern Division, at Governors Island, which gave him an opportunity at the most conspicuous post in the country to continue his propaganda of preparation. He was not careful in his propaganda, however, to avoid the impression that he was criticizing his superiors for failure to prepare. He stimulated more than any man in the country, soldier or civilian, the Plattsburg idea. The year before the Plattsburg camp was formed he had induced many young collegians to take a course in military summer training.

"When we entered the war, in April, 1917, the public supposed that Gen. Wood would be consulted and given an important place in the organization of the Army. Instead he was relieved from duty at Governors Island and sent to Charleston. It is now known that this was personally directed by the Commander in Chief, probably for the purpose of indicating displeasure at Gen. Wood's criticism of the policy of nonpreparation. He was finally sent from Charleston to Camp Funston, one of the National Army camps, and from there went abroad, with other commanding officers, to gain a more intimate knowledge of conditions of the war. On his return he passed a physical examination successfully. The division at Camp Funston received orders to go to France, and with it Gen. Wood as its commander. On his way east the orders were changed, and he was directed to report to San Francisco and take charge of the Western Division, at the Presidio, a command not for the training of troops, but a mere administrative post.

"No official explanation is given to this change. Some who are supposed to be in the confidence of the administration suggest that the change was made at the instance of Gen. Pershing, but no official authority is given for this statement. Gen. Wood has now applied for active command in the training of troops, rather than a position on the shelf. The country is seriously disappointed that Gen. Wood has not been permitted to go abroad with the division which he has been training. The New York World refers to the change of orders in this case as likely to leave a bad taste in the mouth of the friends of the administration.

"Those who are not thick-and-thin followers of the President are even more disturbed. The previous treatment of Gen. Wood creates doubt of the explanation that his shelving is due to Gen. Pershing's request. The suspicion that it is but a continuation of the discipline of Gen. Wood, this time for his recent frank evidence before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, will find strong lodgment in the minds of the people. The public properly has no patience with a policy which would deprive us of the services of a valuable and able military leader at the front merely because he has not restrained himself as he should from pointing out the military mistakes of the administration. The public will not approve his impropriety, if it was such; but it will not think this a reason for holding him unfit or for denying to the country the benefit of his great military knowledge and ability in this crisis.

"One may well recall Lincoln's long patience with McClellan's rude remarks and insulting conduct toward him, and Lincoln's remark that he would hold McClellan's horse for him if McClellan would only render the service the country needed. With a like spirit Lincoln called Stanton to the War Office, in spite of Stanton's previous bitter criticism of him and his administration.

"Is there not time to retrace the unwise step?"

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I close upon this subject by reading a very brief communication, entitled "Canada and Gen. Wood," a communication appearing in the New York Times and signed by some resident, I think, of the city of Montreal:

CANADA AND GEN. WOOD.

To the Editor of the New York Times: Thank you very much for your editorial article of the 31st ultimo on Gen. Wood. If the President only knew the adverse criticism that is going the rounds here among Americans and Canadians because of what on the surface appears to be intentional shelving of Gen. Wood at the time when Canada is ringing with the enthusiasm of the great possibilities of the fast-rolling American war machine, he would give the American people his reason for his action or withdraw the order. The dark-brown taste that this action has left, for the country's good, deserves an explanation.

It is in this aspect, to which I have adverted, I repeat, Mr. President, that I speak upon the subject at all. I iterate and I reiterate that I am indulging in no hostile accusation or criticism. I ask, just as I have a right to ask, when an extraordinary order of this sort be made, when a brave spirit is humiliated at the very time that he expects to go across the water and fight for his Nation, that there be forthcoming to the American people some kind or some sort of explanation. Nothing better illustrates just how far we have gone in this Government than the fact that there is no explanation made to the American people or to the Congress of the United States.

One other matter recently transpiring and the extent to which we have gone in transmuting our Nation will be obvious to you. The other day the gentleman who has charge of the railroads of this country, in addition to many other responsibilities, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director General of the Railroads, made an order increasing railroad rates throughout all the land 25 per cent. The order, I think, was improvidently made, and possibly it may be corrected, at least in some particulars, in regard to interstate and intrastate rates. But, Mr. President, imagine the extraordinary power of this particular act at this specific time. Necessary, you say to me, because of the war! Granted; I am glad to give any power that may come within shotgun distance of being necessary for the winning of the war; but, Mr. President, that order destroyed a generation of work in the State from which I come, and that order is so improvidently made that it increases rates not 25 per cent, but in many instances it increases rates 100, 200, and in some instances 400 per cent. I have the rate sheets that have been furnished me by the railroad commission of the State of California, if information be desired upon that subject.

I cite this as another instance of the peculiar autocratic power that we have conveyed. Necessary, you say, for the winning of the war! Well and good; but in the peculiar autocracy we have created during the past year, I instance this, so that if there is anything left to us, if there is any mode remaining by which we may fight for what we had in the past and return this Government to what it was before, when the final day of reckoning comes do not take it away from us, do not take it under the specious guise of amending the rules relating to debate.

Oh, you understand the insidious advance that power makes. I do not object to the President of the United States when he desires legislation telling Members of Congress what he wishes done and endeavoring to do everything that he can to pass that legislation. I am at variance, undoubtedly, with many of my colleagues in that regard; but when the President has a policy he deems essential to the country, I do not object, aye, I think he ought when he presents that policy to Congress to do his utmost to put it over and put it into effect. I do not object to that sort of thing upon the part of the President at all; but I do object to the insidious advance made on what may be termed the ultra freedom of this particular body. I do object to the planting of the germ, the devitalizing germ, which finally will paralyze free action in the one remaining, the only free forum now in the United States of America.

You have a cowed press to-day, my friends, and you know it. So far as free expression is concerned, you have a cowed people to-day, and you know it; and perhaps in some degree you have a cowed Congress; but, thank God, there are men on this floor with ideals of democracy and a passion for liberty who will stand here when the day comes, notwithstanding a cowed press or possibly a cowed people or a cowed Congress, and make that last fight for democracy. When you shackle anything of ours that will enable us to make that fight, you do an injury to the Republic and you make less possible success and victory in that fight.

To-day it is a limiting of debate, you say. I care not a rap about it, so far as limiting debate be concerned. To-day it is a limitation to an hour or an hour and a half. Six months from now, when you have tightened up more in the fashion that you all understand we are tightening up day after day, when you have centralized more and more autocratic power, it will be a debate of a half an hour on the main question and 10 minutes on an amendment. Six months from that time, when the tension has increased and augmented power granted, then you will have no debate; and the last place in all this world where freedom obtains, the place where freedom of speech may be abused, abused, abused, and abused again, but the last free forum in that day will then have been destroyed, and we here this day will have commenced and made easy that destruction.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, out of order I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD some resolutions from Bristol, Tenn., on the subject of woman suffrage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the resolutions indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not hear the request. What was the request?

Mr. McKELLAR. To print in the RECORD some public resolutions on the question of woman suffrage from Bristol, Tenn.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object to printing them in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, Mr. President, I will ask that the resolutions be read in my time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator can take the floor and read them; but I insist that resolutions shall be printed in the RECORD only at the usual time, and in the ordinary run of the day's business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take the floor and read them.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to say to the Senate in this connection——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I decline to yield to the Senator, and I will ask that the Secretary read the resolutions in my time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I invoke the rule, that it is against the rules of the Senate; and the Senator can not take me from the floor on his desire to violate the rule. I am calling attention to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I assumed that I had the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator had the floor, and he asked to go against the rules of the Senate, and I am invoking the rules of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I have the floor——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. LODGE. This is morning business, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. LODGE. It can only be introduced by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is true, I will withdraw the request.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 235, proposing to amend the rules of the Senate relating to the limitation of debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, it was my intention to proceed with the consideration of the resolution this afternoon, with the hope that we might reach a conclusion. It has been intimated to me, however, by Senators here that they desire to discuss the resolution further to-morrow, and if we can reach an agreement to vote on the resolution and amendments at a certain hour to-morrow, I shall be glad to submit the question to the Senate after the calling of a quorum. I will, however, make the request in advance of calling for a quorum, to see if there is any objection, and if there is not I will ask that a quorum be called and that the request be submitted to the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that the pending resolution and all amendments to it be voted on at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama submits a request for unanimous consent, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock on the calendar day of Thursday, June 13, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon Senate resolution 235 and any amendment that may be offered thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he would not be willing to make the hour for voting 5 o'clock? It will take but a few minutes to dispose of it when we come to it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should be glad to make it 5 o'clock, but I hope the Senator will not insist on it, as I think we can fully complete the debate by 4 o'clock, and there are a number of Senators who would like to get away by that time. It will convenience a number of Senators if we can have the vote at 4 instead of 5. If the Senator insists, I will make it 5, but I hope he will consent to 4 o'clock.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I presume, in all probability, we will dispose of this matter to-morrow; but I do not want to consent to a vote at a particular hour, for the reason that closing the debate at a specified time is not always conducive to the presentation of both sides of the question. I do not know what time will be occupied by others. As I say, I have no doubt the debate will close to-morrow and we will get a vote on the resolution; but I do not like to say that we will commence voting at 4 o'clock.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand, then, from what the Senator says, that he would not be willing to give consent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Alabama that if he would request that after the hour of 2 o'clock debate shall be limited to 15 minutes on the part of each Senator, I think probably everyone would consent, and then the vote could be taken at any time when the debate closes, which must be about to-morrow evening.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama that Senators desire to leave at an earlier time than 5 o'clock, I will withdraw the suggestion I made that it should be 5 o'clock and will make no objection to the suggestion that the vote shall be taken at 4 o'clock. So far as I am concerned, there will be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just a moment; the Senator from Idaho has made a suggestion.

Mr. BORAH. The time is fixed at 4 o'clock?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Four o'clock; or, as I said, I should be willing to agree to 5 o'clock; but a number of Senators desire to get away on a train that leaves about that time, and 4 o'clock would conserve their desire. So far as I am personally concerned, 5 o'clock would suit me as well as 4, but it does not suit other Members of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have just been informed that there are some Senators who desire to be here when the vote is taken who perhaps can not be here after 4 o'clock, and I do not want to deprive any Senator of an opportunity to vote on the matter out of any idea of my own as to how the debate should close. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Alabama whether he will not make a part of his request for unanimous consent a provision that the debate shall be limited to 15 minutes on the part of each Senator after 2 o'clock?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection myself, if no one else objects.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that he make that 10 minutes to each Senator after 2 o'clock. I suggest that he try it and see whether there is any objection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, all right. I will make it 10 minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Otherwise some one Senator might take up all the time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will modify the request, then, so that the debate after 2 o'clock will be under the 10-minute rule.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I must object to the limitation of speeches to 10 minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator object to the 4 o'clock limitation?

Mr. WATSON. I do not. I have no objection to taking a vote at 4 o'clock, but I have an objection to a limitation of speeches to 10 minutes each.

Mr. NORRIS. If I were inclined to deal in the same kind of logic, I would object to the other limitation. I do not want to do that; but some Senator may get the floor to-morrow at 2 o'clock and talk until 4.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think if we agree to vote at 4 o'clock there will be ample opportunity, and I hope the Senator will allow that agreement to go through.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator make it a part of his request that there shall be 10-minute speeches after 2 o'clock?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; the Senator from Indiana said he would object to that part of it, and I hope the Senator from Colorado will not insist upon it.

Mr. KING. I do not know of any long speeches. I am going to speak briefly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I know; but the trouble is that there are many of us who want to express ourselves upon this matter, and we feel that a limitation of time ought to be made. If a limitation of time is not made, you will find that two or three Senators will occupy the entire time, and that the resolution will be crowded to a vote at 4 o'clock without that discussion which I think is the best discussion that can be had. I will ask the Senator from Indiana whether he will not consent that debate of, say, 10 or 15 minutes on the part of each Senator shall be indulged in after 2 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am not disposed to be captious in my criticism, but I think there are one or two Senators who desire to make set speeches of an hour on this proposition. If I am in the frame of mind to-morrow that I am to-day, I shall want an hour myself. I may not be, however.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, is it the expectation of the Senator to object to any unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WATSON. No; I shall not object to a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that it would meet with the approval of Senators if we should limit each Senator to 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator from Alabama whether it is his intention to begin the debate on this resolution at 12 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is the intention to take a recess, when the session closes to-day, to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. Then I shall not object to the 10 or 15 minute limitation on debate after 2 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I make the request for unanimous consent, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the order, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Thursday, June 13, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution S. Res. 235. And further, that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the resolution or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I shall not ask for more than a minute to-morrow, if I ask for that, I do know that taking a recess until 12 o'clock will cut off one or two Senators who have a right to speak, who have not spoken already; and I will ask the Senator if he will not move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock instead of 12?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator modify his request accordingly?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the unanimous-consent agreement is made, I will move a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as the Senator thereby gains an hour, so that these longer speeches can be made, I should like to ask if there would be any objection to limiting the speeches to 10 minutes after 2 o'clock, instead of 15 minutes? I think there are a great many Senators who would like to talk about 5 or 10 minutes, and I want to be sure that they can have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection, if that is satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator will make it 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for an order, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, June 13, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution S. Res. 235; and further, that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution or any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to make that 1 o'clock and provide that no more than 10 minutes shall be given to any Senator after 1 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I do not think that can be done, because Senators desire a longer time than that.

Mr. GRONNA. I have not occupied a moment's time upon this resolution. I want to speak 10 minutes upon the matter, if I can possibly get it; and, while I do not ask to have any time farmed out to me, I shall insist that I have at least 10 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can assure the Senator that he will have 10 minutes, because the time from 2 to 4 will give an opportunity for 12 Senators to speak under the 10-minute rule, and I am sure there will not be that many.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want to deprive other Senators of an opportunity to speak who perhaps will want to speak during that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator will be safe on that score.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest that, if we can agree upon this unanimous-consent rule, we devote an hour or an hour and a half of the remaining part of to-day to discussing the resolution. It is only quarter of 5, and this measure, which has been discussed so much and so many times during the five years that I have been here, certainly ought to be disposed of, with everyone who still desires to speak having an opportunity to do so, by staying here until 6 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection, if any Senator wants to speak; I shall be glad to stay and hear him speak; but if there is no objection to that, I shall ask for a quorum.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator does not need a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is only necessary on bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask that the Chair put the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, except for the fact that it is apparent that the majority of the Senate desires to have this debate closed, I should, exercising my personal views in the matter, certainly after listening to the speech of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] object to any unanimous-consent agreement for closing this debate. I have found, however, that usually when the Senate wants to close debate it can do so by just exactly the procedure which is now being sought without changing the rules of the Senate.

I remind the Senator who has charge of this resolution that there has been little or no discussion of the resolution itself until this afternoon. It is true that it has been discussed for two or three days, but the discussion has been upon the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. There has been little or no discussion of any kind or character upon the resolution, or the substitute for it, except by the proponent of the substitute.

As I say, I shall not object; but I think the Senate is committing a very grievous mistake now in cutting short the debate to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if it is the purpose to adjourn over until Monday if this resolution is adopted to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not speak as to that. The Senator will have to address his request for information to the leader on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I think it would be very injudicious to take that course. The District of Columbia appropriation bill is ready for consideration; and a great many Senators, I know, are very anxious to get through with the appropriation bills in order that we may have an extended recess while the revenue bill is being framed.

Mr. KENYON. I was not in favor of the recess, but I thought if we were going to take a recess we might as well keep on with this discussion.

Mr. MARTIN. When we get through with this resolution I think we had better go on with the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which is awaiting the action of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if any Senator desires to continue the discussion this afternoon I shall be glad to have him take the floor and proceed. If not, at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COMPENSATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE CARRIERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Director General of Railroads, which will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The communication is as follows:

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS,
Washington, June 11, 1918.

SIR: Answering the resolution of the Senate under date of May 23 that the Director General furnish to the Senate for the use of the Committee on Interstate Commerce the copy of the agreement between the United States and each carrier for just compensation, the names of the carriers, if any, which have refused or failed to enter into any such agreement, and the names of the carriers whose systems, roads, or facilities are now in the possession of the United States, or are used, controlled, or operated by the United States under the laws thereof, I beg to state:

No contract has yet been executed with any carrier, and none has refused to execute a contract.

Upon the approval of the Federal control act, the question of agreeing upon a standard form of contract between the Government and the carriers was taken up, the Government being represented by Messrs. Clark, Meyer, Hall, and Anderson, members of the Interstate Commerce Commission; Judge Prouty, director of public service and accounting of the Railroad Administration; Nathan Matthews, of Boston, employed as special assistant to the general counsel; and John Barton Payne, general counsel; and the carriers being represented by their counsel. No conclusion of these discussions has yet been reached.

As the contracts are executed copies of the same will be sent to the Senate; and if any carriers refuse to execute contracts the names of such carriers will be given.

As to the names of carriers whose systems, roads, or facilities are now in the possession of the United States, the Federal control act itself declares to be within Federal control practically all railroads in the country excepting those specifically excepted in the act and those which may be relinquished by the President prior to July 1, 1918. The question as to the extent to which such relinquishments shall be made is now receiving careful consideration. The result is that until July 1, 1918, it will not be practicable to give a list having any permanent significance. As soon as practicable after July 1 a list of the railroads in the possession or control of the United States will be submitted.

Respectfully,
W. G. MCADOO,
Director General of Railroads.

The PRESIDENT UNITED STATES SENATE.

DATA RELATIVE TO PROFITEERING AND THE REVENUE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 8, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President of the Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of Senate resolution No. 253, calling for a report of such information and data as may be in the possession of the Treasury Department relative to profiteering and, specifically, for a list of all corporations, with the amount of their earnings, which have earned in excess of 15 per cent on their capital stock, as shown by their returns to the Internal Revenue Bureau for the calendar year 1917.

The work of gathering and compiling the information and data called for by this resolution will be prosecuted with the utmost vigor, although a reasonable period of time will be required, particularly on account of the large number of returns that must be handled and the great volume of work now devolving upon the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Respectfully,
W. G. MCADOO,
Secretary.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of the Elm Hill Equal Suffrage League, of Roxbury; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Worcester; the Ward 8 Suffrage Association, of Boston; and the First Hampshire Representative District of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the immediate passage of the Federal suffrage amendment to the Constitution, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 4674) granting an increase of pension to George E. Tracy, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from C. P. Hicks, secretary of the Arizona State Senate, advising that on May 25, 1918, both houses of the Arizona Legislature ratified the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Coronado Camp, No. 59, Department of California, United Spanish War Veterans, of Coronado, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to widows of Spanish War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably and with amendments the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 499) thereon. I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill at the earliest opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 4696) granting a pension to Jefferson L. Wylie; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4697) relating to transfers of Government employees and their compensation; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SMITH of South Carolina:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 159) to extend the time within which the President may relinquish control of any railroad, or system of transportation, as provided in section 14 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, to January 1, 1919; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INSPECTION OF TICK-INFESTED CATTLE.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Wednesday, June 12, 1918) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 13, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 12, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.
The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:
Almighty and most merciful God, Creator, Upholder, and Sustainer of all, illumine our minds and inspire our hearts with pure motives, that whatsoever we are called upon to do we may with impunity put our strength behind our convictions in peace or war, in victory or defeat, in joys or sorrows, leaving the results to a wise and beneficent Providence; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.
The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington, August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1553, the migratory bird bill, with House amendments thereto, disagreed to by the Senate, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. FLOOD, Mr. STEDMAN, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill (S. 180) for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Naval Affairs.
Mr. CANNON. What is it—a pension bill?
Mr. RUSSELL. It is a bill to correct a naval record.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.
There was no objection.
Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that change of reference of the bill S. 921, for the relief of James Duffy, be made from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on Military Affairs.
Mr. CANNON. What is that bill about?
Mr. RUSSELL. It is to correct a military record.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.
There was no objection.
Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same order with respect to the bill S. 1923, for the relief of John Doyle, alias John Geary; the bill S. 2205, for the relief of Isaac J. Reese; and the bill S. 3124, for the relief of Francis M. Atherton.
Mr. CANNON. These are all to correct military records?
Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the changes of references will be made.
There was no objection.

THE HEROIC DEATH ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE OF LIEUT. ADRIAN C. EDWARDS, OF CARROLLTON, ILL.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, at the time of our declaration of war Adrian C. Edwards was a young lawyer in Carrollton, Ill. With the brightest prospects he had just entered upon the practice of that profession. Immediately after our declaration of war he tendered his services to the Government and was trained in the Officers' Training Camp at Camp Sheridan, Ill.
Prior to that time he had no military aspirations; his only aspirations were among the lines of his profession and for such civic honors as might be conferred upon him. He had the very highest appreciation of his duty to his country. His bright, cheerful disposition made for him friends of all who knew him. On the 4th day of May, 1918, he was killed in battle in France while gallantly leading his men. No tribute that I could pay on this floor to his memory could be so eloquent as a letter from him to his mother, written by him just before he entered the battle. I send that letter to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read in my time.
He has discharged his full duty to his country. He has made the supreme sacrifice. No patriotic speech made upon this floor since this war started expresses a higher sense of duty than this letter. In its every word it announces that spirit of patriotism which animates the youth of the land in this hour of the Nation's peril.
Lieut. Adrian C. Edwards was my constituent; he lived in my town; he was my personal friend; but it is not with any feeling of sorrow that I send now to the Clerk's desk this remarkable letter written just before he gallantly led the men of his company into battle in France on the 4th day of last month. It is with a feeling of personal pride in the gallant conduct of this young citizen soldier that I ask that this letter be now read here in this high place.

The body of this heroic young officer lies to-day in a soldier's grave in France. When the war is over, after our boys, victorious in battle, come marching home, after the parade of our troops, flushed with victory, up Pennsylvania Avenue in this Capital City occurs, it will be possible to carry out his request and to bring back his remains to the land he loved and inter them at White Hall, Ill., where live the friends who loved him. This letter will, in the patriotic utterances of national heroes, rank side by side with the last utterances of Robert Emmet and Nathan Hale.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

SOMEWHERE IN FRANCE.

MY DEAR MOTHER: I am about to go into battle and have instructed the company clerk to send you this letter in case I become a casualty, hence the receipt of this letter by you will indicate that I am either with God or a prisoner in the hands of the enemy. Since I will never become a prisoner of the Huns, if I remain conscious and able to fight, it is doubtful if I will ever be an inmate of a German prison camp.

Do not grieve that I am among the missing, but rather rejoice that you have given a son in sacrifice to make the greatest military caste of all times lay down the sword, to save civilization, to prevent future wars, to punish the Huns—who have disregarded every law of God and mankind, whose only God is the god of war and military force—and to make the world safe for democracy. I desire that you view the matter in the light and spirit of the Spartan mothers of old, who, when their sons went forth to battle for freedom and their native land, said to their sons: "Either come home proudly bearing your shield before you or upon it."

War was absolutely necessary on the part of my country, and, although I was 34 years old and nobody expected me to go, yet some one had to go; some one must make the sacrifice; some mother must lose her son.

In the light of these facts and knowing our country's great need, I volunteered and have never for one moment regretted my decision, and I will not, although my life and the useful career must end. Life is not the highest boon of existence. There are ideals that are superhuman, interests greater than life itself, for which it is worth while fighting, suffering, and dying.

If possible, after the war, I would like for my remains to be brought to America and interred at White Hall. I have provided well for your support, as I have a $10,000 insurance policy with the Government and several thousand with the old-line companies. My friend, Thompson, and Jess have these policies and other valuable papers.

Good-bye, mother; I will see you in the next world. You may know that I died fighting for you, my country, and all that life holds dear.

Your son,

ADRIAN.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12441) the sundry civil appropriation bill. Pending that motion, I ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] whether we can agree upon a limit to general debate?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I had some conversation with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in regard to general debate this morning, at which time I had received no requests for time. Since then I have received a number of requests. It has been my effort to limit the general debate as far as possible, but there are some gentlemen upon this side who are very anxious to speak for a limited time, and I have concluded that we ought to have about two hours of debate on this side.

Mr. SHERLEY. That would mean practically the entire day in general debate. I was hoping that we might confine the debate to an hour on a side and get into the reading of the bill. The gentleman knows that this is a bill of considerable magnitude and ought to be on the statute books by the 1st of July.

Mr. MONDELL. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, and I join with him in the desire to curtail general debate as far as possible; but some gentlemen here are very anxious to speak, none of them at very great length, and the requests that I have I think could scarcely be complied with reasonably in less than two hours. That is reserving for myself about 20 minutes, and I may or may not take that time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think he might be able to get along with an hour and a half?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we have not had any general debate for quite a long time, and this is a very important bill. I should be very glad to get along with a shorter time, but it seems to me it is scarcely possible. I may be able to reduce that time——

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield? These speeches of which the gentleman speaks are not in reference to this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I think not, generally. General debate is the only opportunity that Members have to discuss matters other than those directly before the House.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that they have had plenty of opportunity in the last couple of weeks in discussing various matters here.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; those matters were brought in under a rule, nearly all of them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think an hour and a half would be sufficient?

Mr. MONDELL. I am so thoroughly in harmony with the gentleman's desire to expedite the passage of the bill that if I could make it less I would, but I do not believe in fairness to this side we could shorten the time to less than about two hours.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that general debate close in three and a half hours. That gives an hour and 45 minutes to a side, and I hope we may be able to yield some time to the gentleman if need be.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think he will need that much time on that side so that he might possibly yield a little time over here?

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope to make a statement to the House that, I trust, will not be long, and possibly there may be one other demand for time on my side, assuming that debate on the gentleman's side does not engender a desire to reply.

Mr. MONDELL. We might get along with three and a half hours.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman himself will be able, of course, under the five-minute rule, as will other gentlemen, to talk about matters in which they are interested.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not desire to take up considerable time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be confined to three and a half hours, one half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three and a half hours, one half of that time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Wyoming. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on going into the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12441, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12441, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12441) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the sundry civil bill is not the largest bill in money that this Congress will pass, large though it is, but it is incomparably the largest bill in the scope and field that it covers of all the great supply bills. In point of fact, there are perhaps not any three or four supply bills put together that come anywhere near covering the activities that the sundry civil bill does, and by virtue of that fact it requires a degree of labor in its preparation that perhaps is equaled in connection with no other legislative matter.

I am at a loss to-day to undertake to present to this committee within the confines of a permissible speech anything like the number of important matters with which it deals. I shall endeavor, with the help of those who have worked with me upon the committee, to explain under the five-minute rule any matters of first importance concerning which the House may be interested to make inquiry, and before now undertaking to speak upon some of the major matters that are new in the bill I want to take occasion to express my own personal obligation and thanks to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] for their help. Without their assistance, extending over a period of more than two months, I would not have been able in any degree to perform this labor. I mention those two gentlemen because the subcommittee, while composed of five, necessarily could not have at all times the help of the other two members. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] gave very valuable assistance when he was not required by virtue of his floor position as leader of the minority to be in attendance on the House, and my friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] did likewise during the days he was present in Washington.

The estimates which were submitted to the committee, together with the authorizations requested, totaled $3,953,567,398.97. Last year the sundry civil bill and the deficiency bills, which carried appropriations that belong ordinarily to the sundry civil bill, had a total of appropriations and authorizations of $2,147,573,092.54. The bill as it is reported to this House carries in direct appropriations $1,917,203,237.57 and an authorization of $945,549,000, or a total of $2,862,752,237.57. This represents a reduction in direct appropriations and authorizations requested of $1,090,815,161.40. Most of that reduction is found in connection with the estimates of the shipping program with which I will deal in a few moments. It may be interesting to give to the House some idea of what the committee tried to do in order to arrive at a judgment in making recommendations and cuts. The hearings started on March 25 and have continued each day practically without interruption up to and including to-day.

The committee has examined over 200 witnesses and has taken evidence that has required 2,543 printed pages, in addition to what will be printed shortly as supplemental, and which will carry it to probably 100 pages more. There is in these hearings more of detailed information touching the activities of the Government in all of its branches than I believe can be found anywhere else. I am in hopes that they will not only have the perusal of the membership of the House, but that particularly they will have the attention and consideration of the chief administrative officers of this Government. Many things that could be remedied, and many of which I am glad to say, as the result of the injury, I believe are being remedied, will be found within these pages. In the last analysis, what I have so frequently said on the floor of the House remains true, that upon the administrative officers of this Government primarily, and we might almost say exclusively, rests the responsibility for the efficient direction of this war. Congress can supply the moneys, Congress can indicate great major policies, but at the last the successful carrying out of those policies rests with the administrative officers, and that responsibility has been accentuated by virtue of the power that has been conferred from time to time by Congress and which in particular was conferred by the passage of what was known as the Overman Act, which gave to the Executive the power to make such change and transposition of duties among the various executive officers as he might see fit.

I shall not endeavor now to call attention to matters that call for criticisms. They will probably come, if they do come, in connection with the consideration of the bill in its details. But I may be pardoned if I make one suggestion, which perhaps is unnecessary, because I understand informally that it has to a certain measure been acted upon and to a greater extent will be acted upon in the future, and that is the need in the Government of collecting in a single source information touching all the activities of the different branches of the Government in such form as to enable a condensed statement of it to be made from day to day for the examination and consideration of the President of the United States, so that he may be able to determine by an examination into the actual facts whether the conclusions which are carried to him from the various heads of departments and men charged with important work are or are not warranted.

To illustrate: Two of the great factors in connection with the prosecution of this war, and which I mentioned in presenting a deficiency bill to the House some time ago, are fuel and transportation. Without fuel there can be no transportation, practically, and no industrial output, and without transportation that fuel can not be carried where it is needed, and the output of the industries of America can not be again distributed. Now, it is of the highest importance that accurate information as to what is correct in connection with those two great major factors should be available, and I am glad to say that much is being done to make it available. But it ought to be made available in connection with a great many other factors of output and activities of the Government. So that, if some one thing or many things seem to be lagging, there can be ascertained what is the real fundamental reason. The fundamental reason is frequently very far removed from those apparent factors with which the man in direct charge of a particular activity is dealing. And, of course, it is perfectly human and natural that men engaged in particular work will see it through optimistic glasses and that their reports, sincerely made, will present a favorable view that all the facts may not warrant.

Now, no man can run any business, and manifestly no business of the magnitude of the Government's business, which is to-day greater than ever dreamed of by any man at any time, without having brought to him in condensed form the real major factors in connection with the activities that are being carried on. I mention this, not because, as I stated a while ago, that I think it is necessary for me to mention it that it might be accomplished—though I may say in passing, such a suggestion of mine was made as early as a month after the declaration of war—but because the absence of such data explains in many instances confusions and duplications that occur in connection with governmental activities. Just one other sentence in connection with that, and that is this: Heretofore there has been a tendency on the part of the various departments to furnish the information of their own activities for the use of their head, and from the information brought to him he drew conclusions, which in turn were assembled, and those conclusions made the basis for final consideration by some one person dealing with these many heads or by the President, as the case might be. The point I want to emphasize is the need of the gathering of statistics and evidence of the actual conditions in the various departments by one single agency of this Government. Presumably, that agency ought to be under the War Industries Board, in view of the very great powers that have been reposed in that board and in the chairman of that board by the President in his letter of some months ago. And if so brought there and so collated, I am sure it will help to simplify many of the problems.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The Council of National Defense in its early history, and probably later on, collected a great deal of information regarding industries and those that could aid in the production of materials, supplies, and so forth, for the use of the Army. Now, I had occasion in the last few days to inquire of the Motor Truck Division of the War Department——

Mr. SHERLEY. I am quite familiar, if the gentleman will permit, with the activities of the Council of National Defense in that regard, and I am not referring to them. What I am referring to, and perhaps I am not making myself clear, is that all of the departments are gathering a great deal of information in their own interests, and the Council of National Defense is gathering a great deal of information in connection with the other departments.

Mr. DYER. That is what I want to say.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know that. But it does not reach the point that I am after, and nobody would be quicker to say so than Mr. Gifford, the director, and he has said so before our committee. What I am after is this, that there shall be a central organization, having the power of the President's warrant, not only to obtain from the different departments the statistics they desire to furnish but also to ask for and obtain any other statistics that such central organization may want, and if necessary make such inquiry as to ascertain whether these statistics so presented do or do not tell the full story.

Mr. DYER. And furnish it to those who need this information, which the Council of National Defense has not done in many instances.

Mr. SHERLEY. What I am anxious about is not simply to furnish information from and to the various departments but that it shall be so gathered as that it shall come to the President and his immediate advisers in order that he may, daily or weekly or at any other period, see in condensed form the actual situation that exists in the various departments. This, I think, will be accomplished.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not also be wise that in making this epitome of the activities of the department, coordinated as you suggest, for submission to the President, they should have that information available to the Members of Congress?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. I think not. There is a great deal of information that ought not——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not mean confidential information.

Mr. SHERLEY. Information that ought not to be made public, and I doubt very much whether much of it ought to be made available even to the various departments. I believe that Congress can not possibly perform the administrative function that is implied in the gentleman's question. I think that the Government ought to be in a position to give to the Congress information—accurate information—touching any matter about which Congress makes inquiry; but at any time to have available to congressional inspection this sort of information, I think would not be wise.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I had not any idea that it would be used for the purpose of admitting Congress into the management of the Government branches.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it is not possible to take a condensation, such as this ought to be, of the daily activities of the Government and make it available to all congressional inquiry without making it public, and I say that without meaning in the slightest degree to reflect upon anybody.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is true, and I would not under any circumstances require that any part of it that should not be made public should be made public.

Mr. SHERLEY. I mean that it could not be shown to four or five hundred men at any time without it being practically made public.

Mr. MADDEN. We have daily statements sent to us by the Secretary of the Treasury as to the state of the Treasury, and if all the information collated from all the departments could be epitomized and sent in such form to the Members of the House and Senate, I do not think it would disclose secrets of the Government, and yet it would put Members of Congress in a position to be able to speak intelligently to their constituents as to the progress of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. What I am anxious about is that the President of the United States shall obtain in usable form the most accurate information possible of what is happening daily in the departments, and I say that simply because I believe that under our form of government and the present method of prosecuting this war there alone can come the information for successful use, and that is said without regard to personalities or parties.

Mr. MADDEN. I think myself that there is not anything more essential than the execution of the suggestion made by the gentleman, placing it in the hands of the President in such form that it would take him only two or three minutes to go over it and enable him to act intelligently in cases where he has now no information at all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not quite conceive that the President has the time to make daily an exhaustive study as to the conditions in each department.

Mr. SHERLEY. I did not mean that he should.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Or perhaps even get an intelligent conception of the condition of the departments by a cursory view of a summarization which may be handed to him on a printed form. It seems, however, that the clearing out of information such as the gentleman suggests might be of great value.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman misses my point, I think. Assuming that this power ought to be put in Mr. Baruch's board—and I say that because of the power already vested in that board by virtue of the President's letter to Mr. Baruch as chairman of the War Industries Board—it ought to be possible, with the right sort of organization there and the right sort of power—and I emphasize that word—for that organization to gather from each of the departments daily or weekly reports as to production and other important factors, and in obtaining that information exercise an independent judgment from that of the department itself dealing with the facts, as to whether the statistics tell the real story or not, and if they do not have them so amplified and so arranged that they shall. Then having had the story by virtue of statistics the summary of it can be made very briefly for the consideration of the President in connection with those conferences that are being held from day to day with the chief heads of governmental activity, and when a statement is made by the head of a particular department that things in his bureau are ruaning well, or that they have been out of joint but will run well, a test could be made, if need be, of the accuracy of his judgment as to the department by the facts. Some other man, looking at it from an outside view, might conclude that the reason why the things were not running well was other than what the man in charge thought, or he might ascertain that, instead of their running well, they were running badly; and in the last analysis, unless the President can get that sort of information in a sense disassociated from the men who are responsible for the work to which the information relates, he will be dependent upon the judgment of the men whose work may be properly the subject of criticism.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think there is any question about the soundness of the gentleman's proposition and his position, but I have in mind this thought that I would like to submit: The gentleman has been having, as we all know, most diligent hearings on the subject of this bill, as he stated, for months. If this information is to be gathered in this highly scientific manner—and that is the only kind of information that would be of very much value—does not the gentleman think that the proper place for it to be deposited would be his committee, or the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Naval Affairs, since it would be applicable there? I do; and let me add this as to the reason why:

Either the committee of the House should vote blindly for any sum asked for, or it should act intelligently on the matter. If we are to vote blindly, let us act quickly. If we are to act intelligently and the House is to cooperate in matters of this kind, accurate information should be available, and I can not see why that information should not be available.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a great difference between voting moneys for a purpose and making inquiry as to whether moneys which have been voted have been efficiently or rapidly translated into things for which they were voted. The one is a legislative function, and a proper legislative function, and the other is an administrative function; and unless you are to disregard totally the distinction between legislative and administrative work you can not, according to my judgment, follow the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Minnesota. Congress ought to have information, and those two volumes of testimony, I think, are evidence of the fact that the Committee on Appropriations has tried to get information touching estimates that are submitted.

The other day I discussed what I think about the method of presentation of estimates. What is really needed is a new method of presenting them and a different sort of audit, an auditor who shall be responsible to the legislative branch of the Government. That I thoroughly believe in; but to undertake now to have Congress checking up figures as to daily production in various activities of the Government would be to make confusion worse confounded.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's view that the President is without authority to effect such an organization as the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. SHERLEY. On the contrary, I think such an organization, if not now in existence, will be in actual working existence very shortly.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know but the gentleman was suggesting some legislation.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; not at all.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman think it is possible for Congress to keep itself informed with reference to the manner in which money has been spent in the past, until there is something that corresponds to an independent audit?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it is not possible to do it expeditiously. Our committee have been trying to do it somewhat, and it is a task that will break any man.

Mr. SANFORD. But Congress as a whole certainly could not share in that task until there has been something corresponding to an independent audit?

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, we have an audit.

Mr. SANFORD. Of course.

Mr. SHERLEY. And that audit, within the scope of the purposes for which it was created, admirably performs its work.

Mr. SANFORD. But of course that is an executive audit wholly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Whether executive or legislative, it does do what it was intended to do.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not doubt that.

Mr. SHERLEY. What it was intended to do is not wholly what should be done. I think the system that was inaugurated by Mr. Gladstone in connection with the English parliamentary procedure is a wise one. They have an auditing committee that is an independent department of government, and it acts as the right-hand aid of the committee on expenditures which Parliament has, and which is perhaps the second great committee of the Parliament. I believe something of that kind has to come in America. But I do not want to get off onto the budget question; that is too big a subject, and it is not going to be solved on this floor. I hope that very shortly Congress may feel warranted in creating a commission and placing at its disposal $100,000 or $200,000. That may shock some people, but I think that much money ought to be available to a commission to make a study and report of a complete reorganization touching the method of the presentation of estimates, audit of expenditures, and a reorganization generally of Congress and the departments.

Mr. SANFORD. I fully agree with the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. We can not do our work fully and conscientiously unless we admit the need of reforming ourselves as well as reforming the departments.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call attention to the material reduction that has been made in this bill in connection with the shipping program, and I want to preface the detailed explanation with the statement that the reduction does not represent in the slightest degree a reduction in program. The committee did not feel warranted in denying a single dollar to the Government in the prosecution of their shipbuilding program, and we have not denied a dollar which they now need. Anyone who is at all familiar with the amount of available tonnage existing in the world is perfectly conscious of the fact that there is a material shortage in that tonnage, and anyone who has even an elementary knowledge of the real basic problem underlying the prosecution of this war from our standpoint knows that its solution is dependent upon ships as much, if not more, than anything else, because we can not transport our forces across the ocean and support them effectively with materials without the ships. So the committee in its judgment would have been wholly unwarranted in undertaking to curtail in the slightest degree the estimates that were submitted in so far as they were really needed. There was asked by the Shipping Board the extension of their program which in money brought it to a total of $4,709,930,000, and which contemplated the expenditure of that money by December 31, 1919. There had been appropriated in deficiency acts heretofore $1,040,000,000. There is carried in this bill $1,761,701,000 additional, or a total of cash for the shipping fund of $2,801,701,000. And there has been authorized in this bill the right to contract for $945,549,000 additional, and there remains unappropriated $100,000,000 of an authorization for the requisitioning of ships made in the deficiency act of October 6, 1917, which makes a grand total of money and authorization of $3,847,250,000, or a difference between the total program presented by them and the total moneys and authorizations heretofore made and now proposed in this bill of $862,680,000. That difference is to be found in this explanation. The sum of $432,000,000 of the cut is in the operation of ships, and is due to the fact that in presenting estimates for the payment of charter hire for ships requisitioned for the fiscal year 1918 and for the fiscal year 1919 no account was taken of the receipts that would be available from the fees received for the use of these ships, the moneys that would thus be earned. And so, by the acquiescence of the board, this $432,000,000 is eliminated without in any wise changing the program.

We give them a working fund of $60,000,000 to aid them during the period between the paying of charter fees and gathering in of moneys for the use of the ships that have been chartered, and that is entirely satisfactory to them. That was one of the things that developed as a result of the examination, and I think if gentlemen will pay the committee the compliment of examining the hearings in connection with shipping they will think that the committee, at least, endeavored to ascertain all the facts.

Four hundred and one million six hundred and eighty thousand dollars of the reduction is accounted for by having made provision for the building program up to the 1st of April of next year, instead of making provision to the 1st of January, 1920. In other words, their program is a program, as presented in their estimates, for moneys and authorizations up to the 1st of January, 1920. It is perfectly apparent that Congress, in the short session, will pass another supply bill carrying items needed for the shipping program. It was clearly stated by these gentlemen on detailed cross-examination that if given the amount of cash and authorization carried here they would be able to go forward without the slightest interruption in the program. Twenty-five million dollars for port facilities was eliminated, not because that money will not be needed but because the gentleman presenting that item very frankly stated to the committee that it was a matter that only recently had engaged the attention of the Shipping Board and of the construction department of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and that they were not prepared at this time to give any details to justify the amount. We believed that if it was necessary it could be taken up by the Senate Committee on Appropriations at a time when they would be able to get more information than we had and could be dealt with in conference.

There was a further cutting of $4,000,000 for the personnel, due to the fact that we thought the estimate did not warrant the full amount they submitted at this time. These four amounts represent the cut of $862,680,000.

I desire to say that, in the judgment of the committee—and I am warranted in saying that it agrees with the judgment of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation—that the amounts we have given here are adequate for carrying out every item provided for in their entire program.

It was testified to by Mr. Piez, of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, that we would have at the end of this year and for the next year a building capacity of from seven to eight million tons dead-weight. Mr. Schwab, in his testimony, was in some doubt as to whether we would have more than six or possibly seven million tons dead-weight capacity, but he felt, and other gentlemen agreed with him, that it was highly desirable that there should be such increase in the capacity of this country as to give to us the certainty for the next calendar year—and in speaking of tonnage capacity they were speaking of calendar rather than fiscal years—the next calendar year a tonnage capacity of at least 8,000,000 tons dead-weight, and possibly a capacity of 10,000,000 tons.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman state what dead-weight means in reference to tonnage capacity?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will not undertake to do it now, but I will put in the RECORD a definition by Admiral Capps given last year at my request, anticipating such an inquiry as this. He gives the definition of dead-weight capacity, gross tonnage and net tonnage, and the definition is more or less technical.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, it is only about 60 per cent of the actual carrying tonnage of the ship, is it not?

Mr. SHERLEY. It depends somewhat on the character of the ship and upon a good many other factors, and that was the reason that I did not care to trust my memory. I am not a shipbuilder nor a navigator.

DEFINITION OF VARIOUS TONNAGE TERMS.

In general, each maritime country has laws framed in great detail, defining the procedure by which the tonnage of vessels shall be obtained; this tonnage being used to determine charges against the vessel for port dues, pilotage, etc.

There is a general similarity in the laws and rules for obtaining the British, American, Suez, and Panama tonnage measurements of ships.

The British and American tonnage rules are defined quite definitely by statute, responsibility for interpretation being delegated by statute.

The Suez tonnage rules were formulated at a convention of representatives from the maritime nations, who met at Constantinople.

The Panama tonnage rules were prepared under the direction of the President, as authorized in the Panama Canal act, and are the result of a careful study of all the preceding rules relating to tonnage. They were made law by proclamation of the President.

The following definitions, though generally applicable to all the above tonnage rules, are particularly applicable to the American.

Displacement tonnage is the actual weight of the ship in any predetermined condition as regards cargo, fuel, stores, or crew in tons of 2,240 pounds each.

Gross tonnage is in general the total volume of the ship, including deck houses, expressed in tons of 100 cubic feet each. The gross tonnage gives a comparative idea of the size of the ship.

In the determination of gross tonnage the rules in certain cases permit the exemption from the gross tonnage of spaces such as inner bottoms when used for salt-water ballast, compartments above the highest complete deck necessary for the operation of the vessel and compartments for the accommodation of passengers when they are above a certain limiting deck and located in superstructure.

Net tonnage is the difference between the gross-tonnage measurement of the vessel in cubic feet and the measurement in cubic feet of certain spaces used for propelling power, fuel, compartments necessary for the operation of the vessel, and crew's quarters, expressed in tons of 100 cubic feet each. The net tonnage is supposed to give a measurement of the earning capacity of the ordinary type of cargo vessel, but owing to the allowances permitted for large machinery spaces it can occur in certain types of high-speed passenger vessels or naval vessels that net tonnage is of no value as an indication of the size of a vessel. In fact, it might possibly be a minus net tonnage.

Register tonnage is the term usually applied in the United States to net tonnage.

The dead-weight tonnage is the load, expressed in tons of 2,240 pounds, which the vessel can carry without being overloaded. This load consists of cargo, fuel for the voyage, water, crew, and stores, and is the term generally used by shipping men to indicate the size of the vessel, but it should be noted that a vessel may not necessarily be able to carry this load in case the cargo is of a light, bulky character.

Cargo tonnage is the weight of cargo, expressed in tons of 2,240 pounds each, which the vessel can carry in addition to her fuel, stores, and crew and effects without being overloaded. As is the case with dead-weight tonnage, the vessel may not necessarily be able to carry this cargo tonnage if the cargo is of a light, bulky nature.

BRITISH VESSELS.

Lloyds Register gives for each vessel the gross, underdeck, and net tonnage. The underdeck tonnage is the gross volume of the vessel to the upper deck and is used as one of the factors in determining the freeboard mark; that is, the depth to which the vessel can be legally loaded and sent to sea, and was originally developed for use of British vessels.

Mr. HARDY. I hope the gentleman will put that definition in at this point in his remarks.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is proposed to spend $100,000,000, perhaps $150,000,000, although they seem to think $100,000,000 will do it, in enlarging shipbuilding plants, so as to bring about this increase in tonnage capacity in the shipyards of America. It was believed by Mr. Schwab that it was not desirable to create new plants, particularly not desirable to create new fabricating yards, because the present yards, when completed, will consume the capacity of the country to furnish the fabricated steel; and if that capacity is to be increased, it might as well be increased at the regular yards rather than in the interior. It was believed further that where you have existing shipyards with an efficient management it was more practicable to enlarge and extend them than it was to create new ones, with the difficulty of working up an efficient organization.

The real problem in connection with the shipbuilding program, in my judgment, is going to be, what I have long thought it would be, the problem growing out of the shortage, not of hulls, but of the machinery for propelling ships. We are going to turn out steel hulls, wooden hulls, and concrete hulls very much faster, in my judgment, than we are going to be able to equip those hulls with machinery.

There has been a considerable agitation in this country for the building of concrete ships. I am not going to undertake to discuss how far that agitation is warranted by proved facts. But it was testified before the committee that the Shipping Board had asked and was prepared to spend $50,000,000 in the making of concrete ships, and the committee has added that sum to the very large amount recommended in the bill for the building of ships.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. We did that in order, if the Congress agreed with the recommendation of the committee, that it might be an indication that $50,000,000 had been provided for concrete ships. However, I want to say in passing that there is not now in the law and never has been in the law one single line that in any way restricted the Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipping Board in the character of ships they should build. Congress, in my judgment, very wisely left those gentlemen the right and the responsibility of determining whether ships should be of wood, of steel, or of concrete, and the type of the ships in regard to the size and other characteristics, and Congress ought not to assume to pass judgment upon the wisdom of building one type of ship as against another. In view of the fact that they themselves recommended $50,000,000, and in view of the known agitation in favor of the appropriation of less money, we gave them $50,000,000 in addition to what they need for their wood and steel program. All the money is available for concrete ships if they desire to spend it in that way.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The committee then proceeds upon the theory that the respective merits of these three classes of ships have not yet been shown and are still in a state of experimentation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not necessarily. I may have an opinion of my own, but I think my opinion as to which ship is the better ship is not worth while, and I certainly think it not worth while to the extent of my voting to compel men whose business it is to know to take my judgment as to which type of ship shall be constructed.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will permit, and if it is proper for him to answer, would he mind telling us on just what plan money is loaned by the Government to these shipyards in order to build yards and ships? What is the general basis of those advances?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have some knowledge in respect to that. It varies in different cases. The Government has constructed three large yards—one at Hog Island, one at Bristol, one at Newark, and one is to be constructed at Wilmington. They are Government yards and will be owned entirely by the Government. There are various forms of contract touching the amount of money to be paid for the construction of ships and the building of yards, but the Committee on Appropriations did not undertake to function on that matter, and it did not for this very good reason, to its mind: The Committee on Commerce of the Senate has taken testimony that fills two large volumes upon that subject. They have gone, presumably, exhaustively into the question of the Hog Island yard, as to whether it has been economically or extravagantly built, as to whether it is wise or unwise. We felt that to undertake that was to duplicate their work, and it was impossible to do it and present to this House this sundry civil appropriation bill in time. I want to say to the gentleman, however, that he will find a very interesting statement by Mr. Schwab, touching all of the shipyards on the Atlantic coast, which he visited after becoming connected with the Emergency Fleet Corporation. That statement as to the general character of these shipyards is exceedingly flattering to the people who planned them. By that I do not mean that Mr. Schwab undertook to pass judgment upon costs, but the statement that he makes as to those yards and as to their capacity to perform the work for which they are created and the wisdom with which they have been created, from an economic standpoint, is complimentary.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I wish to say that nearly a year ago I collected all of the data available at that time in reference to concrete ships. More than a half century ago concrete was used for the construction of vessels of small tonnage, particularly barges; first, I think, in Italy; but the Faith, a concrete ship of 7,500 tons burden, was launched recently at San Francisco, and on a trip from San Francisco to Seattle, under the most adverse circumstances, it proved equal to all of the exigencies of the trip.

Mr. SHERLEY. I received a telegram to that effect from the people who are interested in the ship Faith, and I have no reason to question the accuracy of it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I wish to say this, that I have never yet been convinced from experiments thus far made as to the utility and seaworthiness of concrete vessels of large tonnage. I do not think it has been absolutely demonstrated.

Mr. SNELL. Could the gentleman tell me whether the Government is encouraging or assisting in the building of any new yards at the present time?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the Government is proposing an extension of existing yards. As I stated awhile ago, it is Mr. Schwab's idea that $100,000,000 at least should be expended in that regard, not simply in yards, but also in plants for machinery, with the idea of increasing, as I stated, the tonnage capacity of the yards in America to 8,000,000 tons dead weight.

Mr. SNELL. Have all of the small yards all the work they can do at the present time?

Mr. SHERLEY. As far as I know all of the yards that are capable of building the kind of ships that are needed are engaged in building them. I want to state that there was submitted to the committee a document showing every shipyard in America with which the Government has contracts and the character of the ships they are building, the extent of the completion of the ships, and the cost per ton of the ships, with a recommendation on the part of the Shipping Board that it should not be made public.

For that reason it was not published and while it does not undertake to give the details of the contract in the sense of the exact terms it does give the cost per ton and a general note as to kind of contract.

Mr. SNELL. The reason I asked that question was a short time ago several of the small yards could not get contracts, and I wondered if they have been filled up lately.

Mr. SHERLEY. As far as I know most of the yards that are really in a position to build ships of the kind wanted are actively engaged. Of course, when this whole ship scheme started there were a great many men in America who believed that if they got a contract they could create a yard and build a ship, and particularly did they believe that they could, if by virtue of an offer of more money they could get the technical help, but in so doing they would break up the organization of some of the going ship yards in order to create their own, and with the result that their efforts simply served to hold back rather than push forward the work of building ships.

Mr. SNELL. The yards I had in mind were yards that had been building ships for several years and were fully qualified and knew the ship building business.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not recall that we directly asked that question, but we certainly got the impression, and if the gentleman will read the hearings I think no doubt he will find warrant for it, there were no yards capable of building ships, such as outlined in the program of the Army and Navy and Shipping Board, which were not being employed. And I ought to say now what I should have said earlier, that this program of ships is a program which was quite recently presented by the Army and Navy and agreed to by the Shipping Board in connection with the Government needs for the prosecution of this war and is an enlargement of any other program that has ever heretofore been in contemplation or submitted to the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 52 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Passing now from the question of the shipbuilding program and the appropriations made for it, I desire to call attention very briefly to appropriations that are made for the Food and Fuel Administrations and for some of the other activities of the Government. There is carried in this bill money for what might be designated new services—services that have grown up by virtue of the war and which in large measure, if not entirely, should disappear with the ending of the war. For instance, the Alien Property Custodian is conducting a business that exists only by virtue of our being at war, though it will of necessity continue a considerable time after the war in the winding up and settlement of alien property estates. The Council of National Defense work, of course, is of a war character. The Department of Labor has a program which is a very great enlargement of anything that has ever heretofore been suggested in connection with labor activities and about which under the five-minute rule, if the House should be interested, the committee will give more detailed information. The Food Administration and Fuel Administration grew up out of the war. The War Industries Board and the War Trade Board are activities directly connected with the war.

Now, touching the Food Administration, there was submitted to us an estimate of, as I recall, $12,000,000, of which $7,200,000 was for expenses in the field. The committee has allowed $7,500,000 for the Food Administration. The hearing is pretty full, I think, in connection with the activities of the Food Administration, and we have endeavored to allow them money sufficient to carry on their work. Men will differ as to the wisdom of some of their activities, but the Committee on Appropriations had the mandate of the food law, which had been passed by the Congress, touching this bureau and have endeavored to carry out that mandate, having in mind a requirement of economy on the part of the Food Administration.

The statement made by Mr. Hoover as to the holding of prices to a level and the preventing of runaway prices is an exceedingly interesting one, and if his statement is accepted—and I am not prepared to say that I challenge it—is ample warrant for the expenditure of the moneys that have been expended and the moneys that it is proposed to expend. Manifestly touching food services and affecting food control, there is one of three positions that can be taken: Either the Government can leave the field alone and let the prices run riot as the result of unusual demands with a limited supply, and leave to the longest purse the obtaining of quantities of food, or it can undertake to regulate in every particular the prices that shall be paid for every article of food; or it can undertake to eliminate certain speculative features and to control in a certain degree the prices, controlling, as we are now controlling in large measure by control through a central source the buying of food for the Government and for our allies. Mr. Hoover goes carefully into detail in connection with these matters and presents a statement as to the difference between the price that wheat brought to the farmer and the price that flour was sold to the consumer over three-year periods that would seem fully to warrant the action that has been taken by the Food Administration in connection with the control of this most basic food commodity. We believed that in making the reductions which we have recommended we would not in any way cripple the activities of the Food Administration. Some of their plans necessarily are nebulous and estimates are somewhat speculative. We felt that by curtailing these amounts it would place upon the Food Administration the need for added safeguarding of moneys and the prevention of waste. Mr. Hoover is a man of unquestioned great ability. He has surrounded himself with men of talent and they are doing work of first magnitude, and what I say of him I think it is proper to say generally of the men who are at the head of these new departments. Whether we agree altogether with their views or not, they are bringing to the discharge of their duties a patriotism and ability that will merit the commendation of all and should receive now the praise of those who are familiar with their work. [Applause.]

Of necessity we must give them moneys largely in lump sums and trust to their judgment and patriotism in holding down expenditures. The difficult problem that the appropriating committee had, and that the Congress will have, is in keeping a proper sense of balance. There are hundreds of little things that people can find to complain of if they are looking for things to complain of, but it does not follow that a particular department is not being well run or that things are all going to pieces. In point of fact, I think after two or three months of daily contact with the various agencies of the Government we came to this conclusion, that things on the whole have improved; that these various administrations are shaking down and are becoming more efficient. There is duplication. There is a performance of much work concerning which men have serious question. There is a great deal of work in the way of forming public thought, in the way of conservation of food and fuel, as well as other activities that men would question and in ordinary peace times would absolutely reject; and yet it remains that, speaking by and large, these departments have improved and are becoming more and more efficient.

It is impossible for me to give a review that would mean anything in a speech now. I should have to speak for days in order to do it, and I am speaking now without the opportunity for preparation of notes at all.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment and I will.

There are in these hearings many interesting statements in which I believe gentlemen will be very much interested, particularly the preliminary statements, and the detailed statements of Mr. Baruch, Mr. Hoover, Mr. Garfield, Mr. McCormick, Mr. Palmer, and Mr. Gifford in connection with their activities. And they will get a very much better idea of the situation than I could hope to give by any résumé here.

Mr. LONDON. I agree with the gentleman that the work of the Food Administrator is one of the most valuable activities of the Government now. What I am concerned about is the fact that the Food Administration has asked for $12,000,000 and the committee gave them only $7,000,000. Now, the difference between the amount asked and the amount appropriated is so great that the committee evidently has reduced the scope of the activities of the board. I think those were the figures stated, but, at any rate, the reduction is so large that the committee has evidently contracted the scope of the work of the Food Administrator, a thing which would be undesirable.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman's conclusion is not entirely warranted. The estimate was based upon an activity extending to July next year, whereas Congress will not only be in session in December, but it will have presumably passed before its adjournment on the 4th of March moneys for these very activities, and if we have curtailed too much the remedy can be easily applied. And even in December deficiencies could be submitted. But there are some activities that the Food Administration suggested that we were not at all sure will require the money that they say will be required, and those activities are such that they have not any accurate information concerning them. And with perfect candor they confessed that their estimates were merely estimates. The committee thought, inasmuch as those gentlemen were guessing, and necessarily guessing, that perhaps we would be pardoned if we did a little figuring of our own, and did it on the side of the Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not this also true, that in presenting his estimates, and in presenting some of the other estimates, the estimates were based on the largest possible activities contemplated, some of which would only be necessarily under a condition which may not arise, and that therefore, even from the standpoint of these gentlemen themselves, their estimates would bear some proof?

Mr. SHERLEY. For instance, there was an estimate submitted for State administrators of $2,272,000, city administrators of $400,000, and for county administrators of $4,528,000. Take the county administrators, that item was predicated upon an expense of $1,500 a county, and upon the idea that certain clerical work would have to be supplied and paid for. The committee believed that a good deal of that clerical work could be obtained at a cheaper rate than they estimated for, because it would be partially voluntary; and so with some other of the items. Therefore the cuts were made accordingly.

Now, gentlemen, I have spoken longer than I intended to do. I shall be glad, if I can, to supply during the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule any information that I may have at my command.

Mr. LONDON. There is one other thing I wish to ask the gentleman, if he will permit. Will the gentleman state what new legislation the bill carries, if it carries any at all?

Mr. SHERLEY. Whatever new legislation is contained, and it does carry some—largely what might be termed administrative legislation—is set out in italics in the report.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. In talking about the Food Administration I notice that in imposing fines they are paid to the Red Cross and institutions of that character, and I would like to ask if there is any provision contemplated for paying them into the Treasury? Was there anything said about it before the committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. Nothing developed about that at all. I have no information about it.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman spoke about the appropriation for the bureau having in charge the trading-with-the enemy act. How much is the estimated cost? How much does the bill carry?

Mr. SHERLEY. The War Trade Board asked for $4,110,607, and we gave them $3,500,000.

I am obliged to the committee and reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a great deal of legislative work is rather dull, drab, and uninteresting. That particularly applies to matters of appropriation. The appropriation committees of Congress, and of the House particularly, have an arduous and trying task to perform in their hearings and in the making up of their bills. While these matters are all tremendously vital, some of them are not particularly thrilling. They are of the character of real, downright, hard trench work.

If there is an appropriation bill reported by a committee of Congress that is really tinctured with romance, it is the sundry civil bill, for, as the gentleman from Kentucky has well said, it touches at some point or place practically every activity of the Government, and its items not only refer to activities infinite in their variety but related to the work of the Federal Government extending as far as the flag flies. The sundry civil bill deals with our activities from the Panama Canal and in all the intervening territory to far-away Alaska and Pribilof Islands, in the great waste of the North Pacific and the Arctic Oceans. Its items have to do with governmental activities extending from the Virgin Island to the Philippines and throughout all the territory between. The hearings on the bill, therefore, trying and arduous as they sometimes are, have in them much of live, popular, almost romantic interest; and that is particularly true in these days when the Government is embarking on a variety of enterprises entirely new to our governmental experience, enterprises many of which we hope will continue only during the period of the war, for they are strictly war activities.

As the chairman of the committee has stated, the committee was engaged almost continuously for three months in the preparation of the bill and took 2,500 printed pages of testimony and quite as much that was not printed—informal discussion to inform the committee and to lay the foundation for the definite questions and answers that make up the record.

On behalf of the minority I want to say that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], was most able and intelligent, as he always is, in conducting the hearings. He was also very thorough and very searching in his inquiries. Sometimes in conducting inquiries into governmental activities there may be matters and things with which the minority may consider itself rather more interested in securing detailed information than the majority in control, but in the hearings on this bill the minority has had no cause to complain of any lack of thoroughness on the part of the chairman of the committee in going into every detail of activities that have been questioned and that have been more or less criticized, with a view of determining the facts; not only facts that were entirely creditable, but facts that might form the basis of criticism.

There is ordinarily very little of politics in the consideration of any appropriation bill; there should be none in time of war. That should and does, I think, particularly apply to the sundry civil bill at all times. But just now we are engaged in certain activities, new, growing, wide in their scope, and far-reaching in their effect, which have been more or less criticized. Relative to such activities it is important that all essential facts shall be brought out in the hearings that the committee and the House may be informed by reading of the hearings of the facts on which they may base an estimate of the wisdom or lack of wisdom shown by the executive officials who have carried out or attempted to carry out the mandates of Congress. I believe that in these hearings all who are interested in knowing the facts, so far as we could in the time at our command bring them out in detail, will find the facts set out in a way to be thoroughly informing.

For the first time since the war began a committee of Congress has set about examining the detailed estimates of many of the new war activities. For the first time a committee of the House has been called upon to inquire in detail into these activities, to learn of their character and extent, to secure the viewpoint of the men who are in administrative charge, to go into detail in inquiry and investigation as to the purposes for which the sums estimated are to be used and the lines which are expected to be followed in the expenditure of the public money. For the first time a committee of the House has gone carefully, from the viewpoint of detailed annual appropriations, into the activities of the Food Commission, the Fuel Commission, the great Emergency Fleet Corporation, and the Shipping Board, that will have to do with the management of the great fleet that is being created. For the first time a committee of Congress has reviewed the activities, from the standpoint of the estimates for an annual expenditure of money, of the Council of National Defense, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Alien Property Custodian, and various others of the new and widely extended and constantly growing activities of the Government connected with the war.

In addition to that, the committee has had to consider new activities of established bureaus, such as the new activities of the Federal Trade Commission, growing out of the obligation placed upon that commission by order of the President to inquire as to costs of manufacture and production in a very wide variety of lines. The committee, which ordinarily does not appropriate for all of the wide activities of the Department of Labor, had placed before it estimates and proposals practically doubling the activities of that department along war lines and touching activities related to and connected with the present war situation.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, would it interrupt the gentleman for me to ask him for some information connected with the pending bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to know something about when we are to expect the completion of the Grant Memorial, at the foot of the hill, in the Botanic Garden?

Mr. MONDELL. So far as I now recall, that is about the only activity under the flag which was not considered by the subcommittee; and when I come to think of it, that is not extraordinary, because that is not an activity, but a lack of activity, and I presume we were not called upon to pass upon the matter because it is not an activity at this time.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I think either in these hearings or some other before the committee it was testified that the sculptor, who had been ill, hoped to get the rest of the group finished in September, as I recall it. I do not recall definitely, but there was some testimony by the superintendent, Col. Ridley, to the effect that they were making progress now and hoped to get it done, I think, some time at the end of the year.

Mr. MONDELL. The Chairman reminds me. I do now recall that there was incidental reference to the matter, and the hope was expressed that the work would go on rather more rapidly than in the past.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think I have called attention to this item and this uncompleted monument for 10 years in this body, and I think the only answer is that the sculptor is unwell. I would like to know if he is hopelessly sick and bedridden, and whether in our lifetime we shall see the completion of this monument?

Mr. MONDELL. Now that the gentleman reminds me, I find we have this information in regard to the matter, which I did not recall at the moment, because we did not pass upon it affirmatively in the way of an appropriation: The chairman asked Col. Ridley, in charge of public buildings and grounds, whether the sculptor was well enough to go on with his work on the statue? Col. Ridley said:

> Yes, sir; and not only on that, but on two panels that go on either side of the central figure. Those panels he expects to complete by the 1st of September. Now, as to when the unveiling will take place, I do not know yet, because we want to see the figure in place before we make any plans.

We all join the gentleman from Tennessee in the hope of the early completion of that monument, and I for one have every confidence that when completed it will be worthy of the great captain in whose honor it is erected, and will be in every way a satisfactory monument to him.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman is really hopeful that in our lifetime we will see the completion of this monument?

Mr. MONDELL. Not only that, but that while the gentleman and I are still in Congress that will be done. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the reductions in this bill below the estimates are very great, principally relating to the estimates of the Fleet Corporation. They have been fully explained by the chairman, Mr. SHERLEY, and I shall not go into that matter in detail, or say anything further in regard to that or the other large reductions, than to emphasize the fact that the committee has not knowingly or intentionally failed to recommend a single dollar necessary for our essential war activities. The hearings have again illuminated the fact—and it is a fact that should be borne in mind by gentlemen who believe in a certain kind of budget in this country—that the committee after searching inquiry and investigation have been able to convince the gentlemen responsible for some of the estimates that their estimates were unnecessarily high, that the activities which in their judgment were essential might be carried on for a considerably less sum than they had in the first instance considered necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] if he desires to use the time which I had reserved for him?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman will use it a great deal better than I would, and therefore I will not accept his kind offer.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman. Therefore I will use 15 minutes more.

The committee necessarily had before it at all times a realization of the condition of war, and as many of the estimates in the sundry civil bill relate to activities not directly or indirectly connected with the war or its prosecution, the committee felt it its duty to examine carefully all such estimates with a view of keeping the appropriations as low for those classes of activities as they could be kept, without improperly or unwisely halting work in progress or programs mapped out and in process of completion. And while there has been some considerable reduction in the aggregate of the estimates for those classes of activities, the committee is of the opinion that in no case are these reductions great enough to interfere seriously with such proper continuation of those activities as are justified under existing conditions. We realized that not only would it be unwise to spend the public money on enterprises not essential to the conduct of the war to an extent that might be justified in time of peace, but over and beyond that was the question of using the man power of the country in enterprises of this kind who might be needed either on the fighting line or in the industries that are directly related to the carrying on of the great conflict.

On page 4 of the report of the committee will be found a list of the principal reductions contained in the bill below the amount carried in the current sundry civil bill for the same purposes. The current sundry civil bill, for all purposes other than those of ship construction, aggregated something over $208,000,000, while the appropriations carried in this bill for like services amount to $155,000,000, a very considerable reduction, and yet in the opinion of the committee not a reduction that will be permanently harmful or injurious to any Federal activity.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman mean by "permanently harmful"?

Mr. MONDELL. I will correct that expression; it is not accurately expressive of my thought.

Mr. MADDEN. Because, after all, time is the essence of everything now.

Mr. MONDELL. I think I can truthfully say not to an extent harmful, either temporarily or permanently. Of course, there are gentlemen engaged in Federal activities entirely unrelated to the war who are just as sincere and conscientious in their views as to the necessity of carrying on their work under a full head of steam as are the gentlemen who are engaged in the most essential of the war industries; and if we took the view of those gentlemen in all cases, of course we would appropriate for them as though war were not in progress, but I know the gentleman from Illinois would not approve that viewpoint.

There is a reduction below the current appropriations for public buildings of $12,750,000; a reduction below the current appropriation for armories and arsenals of nearly $30,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume the reduction on the armories and arsenals is due to the fact that we have already constructed these arsenals and armories, is it not?

Mr. MONDELL. That is true to a certain extent. It is due largely to the fact that temporary construction has taken, or will take, the place of permanent construction contemplated, and where that is not the case the permanent work is not essential at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. And the facilities are already in existence to do the things that are necessary for the war.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true. No facility will be lacking by reason of failure to appropriate. As a matter of fact, the department in charge of these activities withdrew the estimate for these items. In the item for construction of barracks and quarters there is a reduction of $7,000,000, due to the fact that barracks and quarters have been constructed in connection with the war activities, and temporary quarters will be provided where otherwise permanent construction might have taken place.

There is a reduction of over $9,000,000 in the appropriation for the Alaskan Railway, but that reduction will in no wise interfere with the steady and reasonable development of that great enterprise, as the bill carries an appropriation of more than $5,000,000 for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I remember at the time we authorized the construction of the Alaska Railway I was opposed to it, and I was rather inclined to believe that it was being built as a sort of experimental proposition, without much hope of development as the result of the railroad construction. What progress have we made and what is the outlook for its completion; and, if the gentleman knows, what advantages will accrue to the development of Alaska by reason of the construction of this railway?

Mr. MONDELL. Very good progress has been made. The work has necessarily cost something more than was anticipated, but not so much more as many works of the same character nearer home. The work is progressing fairly well, and we hope for development there as a result of the work. The construction that is provided for in this bill will do more toward making the Alaskan Railroad available for coal shipments and for local use than all the expenditures made up to this time.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Referring to the first item the gentleman read as to public buildings, does the item of $12,000,000 decrease represent the total cessation of work on buildings throughout the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. It represents the total cessation or stoppage of all construction except as to buildings under contract or buildings absolutely essential to the activities of the Government. Otherwise all construction has been stopped by order of the Secretary of the Treasury and appropriations are made only for buildings under contract at the time the estimates were considered or by reason of the local situation considered essential at this time. There is a reduction of over $3,000,000 in the appropriation for the Panama Canal, although the bill carries a sufficient sum to keep the canal going in good shape and care properly for that great enterprise.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know, if the gentleman can tell, whether the canal has earned sufficient income to pay for its own expenses in the last year?

Mr. MONDELL. It has not earned quite enough to pay its expenses.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the shortage?

Mr. MONDELL. Offhand I could not give the figures with absolute accuracy, but my recollection is that the receipts from tolls for the fiscal year ended June 30 last were about five million six hundred thousand and the cost of operation about seven million, a difference of about one million four hundred thousand as between the cost of operation and the receipts. The gentleman understands, of course, that the war has very greatly interfered with the use of the Panama Canal, and my own opinion is that, in view of the state of war, the showing is excellent.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I was about to ask the same question that was asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and especially if the war did not have a great deal to do with the falling off of revenue. What I want to ask is, is a part of the money appropriated to be used in dredging the slides in the canal, or is it for the maintenance of the normal condition?

Mr. MONDELL. The dredging of slides is a part of the ordinary maintenance of the canal. The great slides have been entirely removed, and the only considerable amount of material that now comes into the canal is material gradually coming in from the toe of the old slides. It is not coming so rapidly but what it can be readily removed by the dredges that are constantly at work.

Mr. HICKS. It is to maintain the normal condition at the present time, and in order to dredge these small slides?

Mr. MONDELL. It is; we have passed beyond the danger of great slides, beyond the probability, and one might almost say the possibility, of any further slides that can or will interfere with the continuous use of the canal to its full width and full depth.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. I want to ask the gentleman a question not connected with what he has been stating, but the chairman said that the committee had Mr. Hoover before it. The food-control bill allowed the President to fix the minimum price of wheat. Did the committee go into the question with Mr. Hoover of how the maximum price was maintained in the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. We did go into that matter somewhat, but did not go fully into that line of inquiry, because it has been gone into by other committees of the House and has been discussed extensively in both House and Senate. The gentleman realizes that we did not have an opportunity to cover all possible fields of inquiry in connection with the Food Administration. In conclusion, let me say that in making up this great bill we have had in mind at all times the fact that the first and essential enterprise of the Government and the people is the successful prosecution and the winning of the war. To this great purpose all else must for the time be subordinated. No sum has been withheld that, in our opinion and in the opinion of those charged with responsibility, is necessary to the carrying on of the great enterprises and undertakings we are engaged in to stimulate production, to effect conservation, to provide transportation on land and sea, and to marshal and utilize all our resources to the successful prosecution of the war.

We have not crippled or unduly curtailed any worthy or useful enterprise of Government provided for in the bill, but our primary aim and purpose has been to amply provide for all activities related to the great industries of production and manufacture that contribute to our success in the war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR].

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, shortly after the United States entered the present war there was adopted, by common consent, what is known as a service flag or service badge, which is entitled to be displayed or worn by those organizations who have members, or those persons who have relatives in the Army and Navy of the United States. These flags or badges have a red border, a white body, and blue stars—the latter indicating the number of men in the service. In cases where a soldier or sailor has met his death the wearer of the service badge, or the organization displaying the service flag, is entitled to substitute a gold-colored star for one of blue color.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCARTHUR. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. In order to make the record complete, in addition to the gold star, to represent a death, a silver star represents a wounded soldier or an invalid.

Mr. MCARTHUR. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that; I had overlooked it. These badges and flags are marks of distinction of which any citizen of the United States, or any organization, may well feel proud. They represent the prompt and cheerful response made by the young manhood of this Nation in this great war for human rights and human liberty against the dastardly menace of Prussianism. They also represent the patriotic purpose of the fathers, mothers, wives, and sisters of the land as well as the numerous organizations that have furnished men for the service. They stand for our national aims and purposes, and our willingness to make any sacrifice for the great cause to which we are committed. They are badges of service, showing that certain blood relatives, or lodge or club members or employees, are either exposed to the bullets or gas bombs, or submarines of the Huns, or are willing to be exposed, and, if necessary, to make the supreme sacrifice.

The United States Shipping Board, I regret to say, has seen fit to supply its shipyard employees with service flags modeled exactly after the regular service flag, but also bearing the inscription, "United States Shipping Board." These flags are being furnished free of cost to Government shipyard workers who are displaying them in their windows, indicating that a member or members of the family are serving the Government. There can be no objection to shipyard workers having a patriotic badge of some character, but I submit that they are not entitled to wear a badge that in any way resembles or can possibly be mistaken for the service badge or flag which represents Uncle Sam's fighting men.

If the shipyard employees are to have badges, how about the great army of men on the farms who are producing food for our armies? How about the men who work in the munition plants or on the railroads that have recently been taken over by the Government? All of these classes of Government employees and food producers are just as much entitled to badges of honor as the man who works in the shipyard.

Let us compare the sacrifices made by shipyard workers and by men in the Army and Navy. The shipyard worker gets big wages and works short hours. He lives at home with his family. If his job does not suit him, he can quit and seek more congenial employment. He has several hours per day for recreation and amusement. He has been known to strike for higher wages and recognition of his union. It is true he is exposed to some hazards, but they are insignificant as compared with the hazards of the submarine and the gas bomb.

On the other hand, the man in the Army or Navy receives low wages, takes such accommodations as he can get, is under strict discipline, and if he quits his job or should encourage a strike among his comrades, he would face a firing squad. He leaves a home, father, mother, brother, sister, wife, and children. He runs the risk of being taken a prisoner and suffering outrage and cruelty beyond description. Last, but not least, he is in constant danger of death—either on the high seas or on the battle fields of France and Flanders. Our newspapers are full of casualty lists, which are growing larger and larger each day—showing that our boys are giving life and limb in order that free government may be perpetuated, not only for our children but for the children of all nations.

I submit that it is an insult to our brave soldiers and sailors and our gallant marines for the United States Shipping Board to prostitute the service flag of our fighting men, and I here and now call upon the proper officials of the Shipping Board to rescind their action and call in their flags. If the shipyard workers are to have a badge or emblem, let it be in different colors and of a different design. Let the national service flag be unique and distinct—a badge representing active naval or military service.

The action of the United States Shipping Board in supplying shipyard workers with these flags that are almost identical with actual service flags, is reprehensible. If the practice is not discontinued Congress should enact such legislation as may be necessary to protect the service flag and honor it. This flag and its counterpart, the service badge, occupy a place in the hearts and affections of the American people second only to Old Glory and should be correspondingly honored and respected. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to quote briefly from an editorial recently published in the Milwaukee Journal and to submit a few observations on Wisconsin. I further desire to offer uncontrovertible evidence of responsibility for wantonly unfounded charges of disloyalty registered against Wisconsin.

The extract from the Journal of May 21, 1918, is as follows:

> Milwaukee and Wisconsin are confronted by a general charge of disloyalty * * *. Face the facts squarely * * *. What about the general course of nearly all Wisconsin Members of the lower House of Congress? And the backing and filling of the legislature? There are black spots on our record * * *. We can not claim to be 100 per cent American so long as those black spots remain. It is for us to wipe them out—

And so forth.

Similar expressions in this, the leading Democratic paper in the State, occur with frequency, and a few facts are offered at this time regarding "black spots" and in explanation of motives behind such criticisms.

Wisconsin has a solid Republican delegation in Congress; all its State officials are Republicans; and its legislature is and long has been overwhelmingly Republican. This political sentiment in the State has occurred notwithstanding abuse and constant attacks for years from the Milwaukee Journal, which paper gave inspiration for a "loyalty" fight against LENROOT in the recent senatorial election.

Since the declaration of war in April, 1917, interests, political and otherwise, have assailed the loyalty of my State and, led by the Milwaukee Journal, they have continually denounced the State officials, State legislature, and congressional delegation, and those of political parties or factions other than their own, together with charges against the loyalty of different nationalities and various people within the Commonwealth, until the old Badger State, ever loyal since its entry into the Union, is being looked upon with doubt and suspicion by those who do not understand the full meaning of Wisconsin politics.

During the recent senatorial campaign these same political agencies within the State that have maintained attacks on the State's loyalty persuaded the President, Vice President, Democratic senatorial whip, and scores of Democratic Senators, Congressmen, and Democratic administration officials to assail the loyalty of the Republican candidate, and, incidently, to indict the people of the whole State through a fictitious and false issue.

The purpose was to overwhelm the people with charges that could only be repudiated by the election of a Democratic candidate in order to prove loyalty to our Government.

THE SAME PARTISAN POLICY IN NORTHERN STATES.

It was the same policy pursued by the Democratic National organization and State Democratic organizations in New Hampshire, Indiana, and elswhere in special congressional elections, on which occasions the electorate were told that a vote for the Democratic candidate was a vote to sustain the war, and a vote for the Republican candidate was "a vote for the Kaiser."

Following the campaign of vilification and abuse in and of Wisconsin, I offered a few remarks in the House on April 5, last, showing the vicious methods pursued in libeling our State. I did not then quote slanders uttered against the State or the Republican candidate, excepting in a single instance when referring to a printed advertisement in the Rockford Morning Star, a Democratic paper, addressed to the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant, which was as follows:

TUESDAY, April 2.

To the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant:

You are entitled to vote for United States Senator from Wisconsin to succeed Senator Paul O. Husting.

President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for Joseph E. Davies for United States Senator.

Davies's election means joy at Washington and gloom at Berlin.

Davies's defeat means gloom at Washington and joy at Berlin.

The substance of that infamous charge had been repeated by the Democratic press and Democratic orators, with slight variations throughout the campaign, at a time when Wisconsin had 40,000 men under arms and 20,000 of her boys on the battle front in France.

The effort failed, and Wisconsin repudiated the unjust attack upon her loyalty by electing Senator LENROOT. Even the boys at Camp Grant refused to be stampeded by a "disloyalty" cry, and cast their vote for Lenroot, 576; Davies, 403; and Berger, 85.

Wisconsin had furnished more volunteers, proportionately, than any other State. Her troops were in France defending their State and their country; her contributions to liberty bonds and Red Cross led the States in that district; and her people were not deceived by partisan efforts to capitalize the war politically. To-day her people hold their heads erect and scorn the insinuations of political patriots, for many champions are offering evidences of loyalty that place Wisconsin among the first of all States in the Union.

REVIVING THE PARTISAN "ACID-TEST" ISSUE.

Recent efforts to revive that same issue have been apparent in Wisconsin through frequent published utterances of the Milwaukee Journal and its press imitators in the State, aided by certain interests, a few ambitious candidates, old-time political enemies, and in part by men of honest convictions, but all inspired from one common source that has been primarily responsible for slanders against Wisconsin and its officials, and for the character of the recent Senatorial fight.

To remain silent is to have silence misconstrued; and I desire briefly to show who are responsible for the calumny heaped upon public men and upon a great State during these trying times of war, and also the purpose of the attacks.

In fixing responsibility for shameful assaults upon Wisconsin's loyalty, an article from the New York American of June 8, 1917, under a Washington date line, is first offered. This paper has the largest circulation of any paper in the country.

Shortly after our entrance into the war the American published—first page, first column, 8-inch staring headings—a long article, of which a brief extract is as follows:

Charges of an organized plot in the State of Wisconsin to defeat the draft were laid before President Wilson by L. W. Neiman, editor of a Milwaukee newspaper. He declared influences were at work to overthrow the entire military program of the Nation.

The Wisconsin plot, as disclosed by Editor Neiman, included the use of pro-German newspapers in carrying on the propaganda against the draft. He was introduced to President Wilson by Senator Husting, of Wisconsin, and presented for the President's inspection a list of charges and evidence to bear them out.

The plot, according to Neiman, went beyond the mere urging of men not to register; it is designed to render the United States powerless and impotent in the war.

Agents of the Department of Justice and the United States Secret Service already are working on the case, it was indicated at the Department of Justice, and early arrests are likely.

I desire to show how baseless were these charges and other like reports, but digress for a few moments to take up another branch of Wisconsin's publicity bureau on claimed disloyalty.

I now quote from the Washington Post of April 18, 1918, a paper of widespread circulation, the following libel of a great State:

Traitors in Wisconsin. Defense Council chairman asks Senate for firing squad. W. P. Bloodgood, testifying before the Military Committee, says that war cases are beyond courts. Could not get jury to convict. Indorses Chamberlain measure (for a drumhead military court to try civilians).

Defense Council chairman asks Senate for firing squad. W. P. Bloodgood, testifying before the Military Committee, says that war cases are beyond courts. Could not get jury to convict. Indorses Chamberlain measure (for a drum-head military court to try civilians).

The American element in Wisconsin appealed to Congress yesterday to provide firing squads to purge the State, and the Nation as well, of treason and disloyalty. * * * The people are likely to go back to primitive methods.

Mr. Bloodgood declared "something most unfortunate is likely to happen." Feeling grows with the departure of every transport to the battle fields—

And so forth.

I have only given a brief extract from the article which, like Mr. Nieman's charge, with staring headlines, was published throughout the country. Mr. Bloodgood stated to the Senate Military Committee, "I am acting chairman of the County Council of Defense of Milwaukee County and am a member of the executive council of the Wisconsin Loyalty League of the State, and also a member of the law firm of Bloodgood, Kemper & Bloodgood, Milwaukee." The defense league, he said, "arranges for patriotic meetings throughout Wisconsin and has waukee Journal, previously quoted." In offering Mr. Bloodmittee, it appears he is not only chairman of the Milwaukee County Council of Defense and member of the executive committee of the Wisconsin Loyalty League, but in addition thereto he is on the advisory board of the League for National Unity and also an executive officer of the National Civic Federation, organized for the same general purposes, and he is also a foremost leader in the "next of kin" organization, that is founded upon sons who go into service. Altogether Mr. Bloodgood is a man of importance, according to his own admission.

From a column article in the Washington Times devoted to Bloodgood's exhibition before the Senate committee is the following comment: "Mr. Bloodgood gave a most instructive review of recent political history in Wisconsin leading up to and explaining the crisis at which leading citizens of Milwaukee, including himself, had been referred to as the 'exquisite gentry of the city'; other newspapers had indulged in similar treasonable ribaldry. The occasion, it seems, was given by an election in which Mr. Bloodgood and his associates were highly outvoted by the rabble. To show how bold this unshackled treason had grown, Mr. Bloodgood testified that one paper had even called them 'lunatics.'"

The reporter's keen humor, based on actual observations of Bloodgood before the committee, discounts the wickedness of his assault upon the people of a city and State unrepresented at the hearing. The tirade was occasioned, apparently, by the reelection of Hoan for mayor, and a large Socialist vote cast in Milwaukee and Wisconsin, and, possibly, by the results of the senatorial election.

In his hearing before the Military Committee, where he is quoted in favor of a firing squad, Bloodgood, in the record, gave a statement he had previously sent to the Attorney General, wherein he says, "What took place at the meeting" with Mayor Hoan in April, 1917, immediately after the declaration of war, "is contained in a written statement that I prepared for Mr. Nieman, of the Milwaukee Journal." At that early day the close association of the State Democratic leader and Mr. Bloodgood is apparent.

THE PRESIDENT DEFEATED MR. BLOODGOOD'S BILL.

When President Wilson's attention was called to Bloodgood's wildly reckless statements made before the Military Committee, and his demand for firing squads and drumhead courts-martial for Milwaukee, for Wisconsin, and for the country at large, the President at once wrote Senator OVERMAN that the proposed courts-martial bill was "unconstitutional" and that it would "bring us to the same autocratic Prussian form of government in Europe which we desire to escape."

The Washington Times of April 22 says, in explanation for its introduction:

The bill was in response to the arrogant tactics of Germans in public office in Wisconsin * * * that brought about the proposal to suspend jury trials and try these offenders by courts-martial. Inability to get 12 true Americans in Wisconsin juries * * * swung the Senate Committee on Military Affairs into line behind the courts-martial bill.

The enormity of the offense against his State and his country appears from this report that an attempt to foist an unconstitutional courts-martial law upon the country had its inspiration with Mr. Bloodgood and his advisers in Milwaukee. It was the President who proceeded forthwith to kick from public office the Assistant Attorney General who had aided Bloodgood, without General Gregory's knowledge, and it was the President himself who protested against vicious drumhead courts-martial being fastened upon the country.

On March 22 last the press of the country carried a sensational story credited to Bloodgood. I quote from the Washington Star:

WANTS MILWAUKEE PUT UNDER MARTIAL LAW—DEFENSE CHAIRMAN SEEKS INDICTMENT OF HOAN, MAYOR.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., March 22.

Wheeler P. Bloodgood, chairman of the Milwaukee County Council of Defense, told newspaper reporters yesterday that he had papers drawn up to seek the indictment of Mayor Daniel Hoan. That Hoan's reelection as mayor being practically assured, he, Bloodgood, would seek to have Milwaukee placed under military law * * * "I say solemnly," he is quoted, "that the soldiers' 'next of kin' will not stand for a socialist government in Milwaukee or the State of Wisconsin. We are prepared to act. We will, for instance, act if we do not get martial law or an indictment which will prevent Hoan from being sworn in again as mayor. I hope that it will not be put up to our organization, but if it is necessary we will not falter."

Bloodgood, chairman of the council of defense—appointed to protect law and order and the good name of the State—also member of the executive board of the Loyalty League and the advisory board of the National Civic Federation and executive officer of the League for National Unity and founder of the Next of Kin League and of the law firm of Bloodgood, Kemper & Bloodgood—Bloodgood declared to the people of the country, according to the press, that mob law would prevail in Milwaukee and in Wisconsin. He is reported to counsel anarchy and mob violence, and he placed his people before the country as a riotous, lawless, disloyal people, and gave the widest publicity to his slanders on Wisconsin, that were heralded from one end of the world to the other.

I am not questioning the high purposes of the various organizations named, or the belief that much good has been occasioned by normal, intelligent men acting through such voluntary bodies in encouraging patriotic sentiments and love of country. I do say, however, that any body of men that permits Bloodgood to act as their chief advisor, spokesman, and director, gives him the vehicle on which he rides at headlong pace until finally, but only temporarily, squelched by the President of the United States. In this connection it may be proper to add that associated with Mr. Bloodgood in his Civic Federation labors appear from the letterheads a former partner of and also the attorney for J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., Mr. Du Pont, and many other leading financiers, transportation, and general big business men.

Incidentally such men are not urging the election or reelection of Members of Congress in Wisconsin who favor a larger proportion of war profits with which to meet present and future national obligations. Neither do they desire control of transportation companies nor the election of men not in sympathy with their ideas.

AN ATMOSPHERE OF DOLLARS.

Before discussing Mr. Bloodgood's political activities, which encompass the entire congressional field in Wisconsin, it may be of value to know how far his own business interests and methods naturally influence his acts. In the Milwaukee Journal of May 23, 1918, his favorite vehicle for self-exploitation, I quote the following shrewd business operation:

DETAILS OF SALE OF INDEPENDENT HARVESTER CO. AT PLANO, ILL.

Proposed purchases of $10,000,000 plant for $5,000,000 were submitted. Proposed purchasers are Francis Bloodgood, jr.; Jackson B. Kemper; Wheeler P. Bloodgood; and others. The charge that the suit is a collusive one carries an implication that appears unjustifiable. * * * The commission held that there was no proof that the purchase was with a view of getting control of the International Harvester Co.

"No proof," possibly, but it appears from the Journal's report that Wheeler P. Bloodgood was the man who negotiated the big deal to buy up the great agricultural implement plant a few days ago at 50 cents on the dollar. "No proof" that the purchase was with "a view of getting control of the International Harvester Trust," but no farmer in Wisconsin or in the country believes any actual competition, reduction in prices, or better conditions will come to him through Mr. Bloodgood's deal. The $5,000,000 discount from face value was not for the farmers or general public. Apparently that was profits for those who made the deal, including Mr. Bloodgood, who, in turn, is associated with the Morgans, Du Ponts, and various political and great financial interests. Bloodgood, who wants a firing squad for Milwaukee, and is now about to select Wisconsin's Congressmen and save the farmers, laborers, and people of the State generally from that duty, as I desire to show. Bloodgood's leading Milwaukee political associates at once suggest his eastern financial connections and the motive behind his present political activities. It is on such meat our new Wisconsin political Cæsar feeds.

The President blocked Bloodgood's drumhead courts-martial and the people may block his political big-business scheme now carried on under a "loyalty" cloak. [Applause.] With his peculiar ideas of public and private rights and un-American belief in what the President says is an "autocracy from which we desire to escape," Bloodgood makes more socialists in one week than Carl Marx could make in a year, more discontented and indignant protestants through intolerance than all other agencies in Milwaukee and Wisconsin combined.

Mr. Bloodgood stated to the Senate Military Committee that Mr. Nieman, editor of the Milwaukee Journal, was one of the "most active" men in the county council of which Mr. Bloodgood was chairman. Before the Military Committee, when discussing his leading associates in the Wisconsin Loyalty League, he named particularly Mr. W. S. Goodland, editor of the Racine Times-Call, and also another man, whose company is reputed to have cleared $1,500,000 last year in Government contracts.

My purpose in mentioning Messrs. Bloodgood, Nieman, and Goodland by name is not to reflect in any way upon the different organizations to which they belong, but to show a joint effort which can not be overlooked when fixing responsibility for frequent bitter attacks upon Wisconsin's loyalty.

BLOODGOOD TO CONTROL CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGNS.

In the Milwaukee Journal, issue of April 30, appears the following:

To favor loyal candidates, Loyalty Legion to take part in congressional campaigns. "next of kin" organization of men connected with soldiers in France to be organized.

It was further stated that the general council of the Wisconsin Loyalty Legion, of which Bloodgood and Goodland are conspicuous members, declared in favor of bringing out "men of recognized loyalty and supporters of the war as congressional and legislative candidates." The Journal's frequent editorial expression will be found in the announced purpose to elect "nonpartisan" loyalists to succeed the present Wisconsin congressional delegation, which has committed the offense of being solidly Republican, having been elected in 1916 with a joint plurality of 100,000 over their Democratic opponents.

Following its announcement that the Loyalty League, headed by Messrs. Bloodgood, Goodland, and others, proposes to relieve the people of Wisconsin from the burden of selecting their Congressmen, the Milwaukee Journal of May 16 published a "call" issued by W. S. Goodland, of Racine. "This is a step," it declared, "in the fight against reelection of Congressman H. A. COOPER." An extract from the "call" reads:

The loyal Republican voters of this district (first) feel that * * * the people of this district—in fact, the people of the whole State—have been subjected to the suspicion of disloyalty largely because of the votes, speeches, and actions of a majority of Wisconsin's Members of Congress, including the Representative of the first congressional district. They have been discredited and their loyalty questioned because of the record their Representatives in Washington have made. None but true Americans should be elected to Congress, men whose loyalty and patriotism can not be questioned, and who will stand firmly back of the National Government in the prosecution of the war to a victorious conclusion.

I wish that I might digress sufficiently to give a brief statement of interests behind the first district call, apart from the connection of Messrs. Bloodgood, Goodland, and others, but it is impossible to do so at this time. Nor is it necessary to offer any indorsement of HENRY ALLEN COOPER, the dean of the Wisconsin delegation, with 26 years' continuous service to his credit, the longest of any man in Congress excepting Minority Leader GILLETT, whose service is the same. COOPER's great experience and valuable legislative ability are recognized by every Member of the House and known throughout the country. His patriotism is sincere, not political. [Applause.]

Diogenes Goodland started out with a lantern to look for a true American in the first district to supplant COOPER, but burnt no midnight oil in the operation. A congressional Barkis for years, a critic of COOPER and the present delegation through his paper, in season and out, what more natural than that Candidate Goodland, the self-accredited agent of the Loyalty Legion organization, when searching for a "true American" should glance at his own reflection in the glass and then blow out the lantern?

But others who signed the call had ambitions of their own, and every county came forward with its own true American, until after a long, hard tussle to see who was the truest American, the league leader was sent back to the ranks, and a man of unknown patriotism, political or otherwise, was chosen to supplant the oldest and one of the ablest Members of this House. That is the admitted result of this "loyalty" conference. We have no law in Wisconsin which prevents a handpicked gathering of political opponents from calling together all malcontents, would-be candidates, and their supporters, but when the primaries are held there is no obligation, ethical or otherwise, to support the holder of an empty lottery prize in this elimination game.

THE PURPOSE BEHIND THE MOVEMENT.

There is no patriotism, no loyalty to the Government, no fidelity to principle in the thinly-veiled political motive behind this movement to dictate Wisconsin politics now put forth by Mr. Bloodgood and other Milwaukee interests affiliated with great eastern interests as has been indicated. From the days of his noted fight against the Pacific Railway grab of over $100,000,000 many years ago down to the present time, my colleague, Mr. COOPER, has been recognized as one of the fearless men in Congress, of progressive ideas, whose quarter of a century service in this body has been devoted to public and not private interests.

He is now slated for defeat, together with the other Wisconsin Congressmen, not because of any disloyal vote or utterance, past or present, but he is not in harmony with the political and financial interests that once again desire to have their own Representatives in Congress from Wisconsin. Legitimate business, big and little, never has had reason to fear unjust treatment at the hands of Congress, but Bloodgood's $10,000,000 Harvester "no proof of illegal purpose" deal, and huge war profiteering interests in Wisconsin and elsewhere can cry "loyalty" and "nonpartisanship" to cover up their real purpose. Bloodgood, according to the Wisconsin press, is strenuously trying to change the Wisconsin primary law in order to take from the people their right to make direct nominations, so that candidates acceptable to his own purposes will be named on all tickets as in the good old days when the trusts, railroads, and other special interests claimed to have their friends in control in Congress and in many State legislatures, including Wisconsin. The people may well ask who pays the large bills incurred by Bloodgood's organization for salaries, speakers, travel, advertising—and why?

Under the guise of patriotism and loyalty varied interests may now work through most available agencies, and while poisoning the public mind quietly organize opposition through old-time political and personal enmities and by arousing new ambitions. Whispered calumny, misrepresentation, and false charges are put forth in these abnormal times to mislead the average citizen at a time when the public mind is disturbed by vital public affairs and when Representatives in Congress are powerless to meet charges because of their needed presence here to furnish money and men and other legislation in carrying on the war. No public official has right to complain because ambitious candidates believe their own ability, experience, or judgment better qualifies them for office, but no self-respecting official will calmly permit charges of disloyalty to be lodged against him, whether he be a candidate for reelection or not. Neither will he quietly permit any opponent to cloak his ambitions in a hypocritical claim of superpatriotism in order to deceive these whose suffrages are asked.

I believe it is a public duty to this House and the country to expose the campaign inaugurated in Wisconsin by Bloodgood and his associates, but do not care to discuss any individual matters further than to fix responsibility for efforts to stain reputations of men and of the State, and to call attention to political and personal motives behind Congressional and State contests in Wisconsin. Practically every district is to be controlled by the despotic Mr. Bloodgood and his Milwaukee aides, according to published plans, and the following news item is similar to others affecting his operations throughout the State.

The Wisconsin Loyalty Legion, which is taking great interest in the congressional situation in the State, seems to think, according to the statements of its officers (Bloodgood et al) that candidates will be in the field in all of the congressional districts of the State either in the primary election or at the polls, who will represent the ideas of the league and practically run under its indorsement. (Milwaukee News, June 5.)

That this statement is authorized may readily be believed from its efforts which are reported elsewhere in the State.

THE REJECTED ACID TEST.

At the risk of repetition, I offer a brief extract from my address of April 5, affecting the so-called "acid test," as a basis for discussing for a moment the record of my colleagues from Wisconsin on the declaration of war, and to say at this time that practically every war measure since war was declared, some 100 in number, have been uniformly supported, according to my recollection. That "test" was rejected by the voters of the State in electing Mr. LENROOT, whose loyalty no man questions:

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the unprecedented action of distinguished officials in seeking to advance interests of the Democratic candidate by charges of wholesale disloyalty against my State at a time when every ounce of energy should be joined in united effort here; when Wisconsin's sons are giving their full measure of devotion in France; and when every man, be he a Democrat or Republican, is first of all a loyal American. That slander has been publicly rebuked by the electorate of Wisconsin. I do say that the "acid test" of loyalty mentioned in President Wilson's letter and Vice President Marshall's speech on the McLemore and other prewar measures would empty the seats of one-third of the membership of this House, Democrats and Republicans alike, notwithstanding these same Members have stood for and voted for every war measure presented to Congress.

That "acid test" of votes before the declaration of war would bar Congressman MANN, the distinguished leader of the House minority, whose loyalty and patriotism is unimpeachable. Even the veteran leader and eminently patriotic ex-Speaker CANNON [applause], the grand old man who sits before me, with his four-score years and lifelong record of great public service and unrivaled loyalty, would fail the President's test. Congressman WOODS, chairman of the congressional committee, who enjoys the respect and high esteem of every House Member, and Representatives LENROOT, ESCH, HAUGEN, COOPER, HAYES, MASON, DAVIS, and scores of other strong, loyal Republicans would be disqualified by the President for public service.

DEMOCRATIC LEADERS AND THE ACID TEST.

More remarkable, the President's "acid test" on votes cast prior to the war would remove from Congress the distinguished Democratic leader of the House, Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina, whose able direction of war measures has been loyally supported by Members on both sides of the party aisle. Representative Fitzgerald, the Democratic wheel horse from New York, and FOSTER, KEATING, SLAYDEN, SHACKLEFORD, General SHERWOOD, hero of over 40 battles during the Civil War [applause], and many other strong Democratic Members voted against measures that the President now declares in his letter are "acid tests" of loyalty when applied to a Republican candidate for the Senate in Wisconsin. All these distinguished men and loyal Americans are included in the indictment lodged against the State of Wisconsin. Wisconsin, indeed, is in good company. If acid tests apply in Wisconsin and New Hampshire, then surely they applied to Gray, of Indiana, who voted against the "acid-test" measures and yet received the President's written approval. Does not the test apply to Democrats in Missouri, Mississippi, Texas, and North Carolina? Can the President say, "One rule for northern Republicans, but another for southern Democrats"? If so, why?

More significant of present-day partisanship, the President's acid test, if applied to Abraham Lincoln, who actively opposed the Mexican War, would have disqualified our greatest American and martyred war President from reelection to this House or from any higher office notwithstanding his unquestioned loyalty to his Government.

Is there any difference in the loyalty of the official, however high, and that offered by the humblest mother in the land who hoped and prayed against war, but gave her all when her country called?

Even President Wilson said to us in his messages prior to the war, "I am inclined to think that Germany had a right to sink belligerent ships without warning," and five weeks before entering the war he said he was "not contemplating war or any steps that might lead to it."

Who will question the right of utterance of such sentiments prior to the declaration of war, or the patriotism of the President, or of hundreds of thousands of fathers and mothers who anxiously prayed against war and for guidance from on High for the President in his hours of trial and responsibility. What proportion of the people of this country would have passed this "acid test" before the declaration of war no man can tell, and candidates who make claims of superloyalty now must offer their own records of service for war and greater sacrifice in its prosecution. Silence in the past on the part of those without records will not meet "acid tests," though they bear a President's indorsement, for the same reason that Congressman Gray, of Indiana, who failed in the test and election, received that same high indorsement before defeat.

When Congress declared war, Representatives in Congress, Democrats and Republicans, unitedly gave loyal support to every measure that would help win the war, and their example has been emulated by every State and every community throughout the country. That must be the true test of loyalty.

In commenting editorially on this same subject, the Milwaukee Sentinel, a leading Republican paper of the city and State, on April 11 said:

As to acid tests of loyalty, Representative FREAR, of Wisconsin, stated the absolute correct principle in his speech for Wisconsin last Saturday.

Obviously the real acid test of a public man's loyalty on the soundness of his war record lies in his views and votes, not prior to but after his country's entry into the war, for, as Mr. FREAR pointed out, "Even the President said to us in his message prior to the war: 'I am inclined to think that Germany has a right to sink belligerent ships without warning.'" * * * Mr. FREAR was eminently right when, in standing up for his own party and State, he said: "When Congress declared war, Representatives in Congress on both sides of the aisle gave loyal support to every measure that would help win the war, and their example has been emulated by every State and every community throughout the country. That must be the true test of loyalty."

To the same general effect is this brief extract from an editorial in the Capital Times, a strong progressive Republican paper of Wisconsin:

A COMPLETE ANSWER—IS WISCONSIN DISLOYAL?

No better answer can be made to this question than the address that was recently delivered by Representative JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, and the Capital Times at this time is glad to reprint it in full * * *. Wisconsin has been the victim of an unscrupulous campaign of abuse of patriotic feeling for partisan purposes. This campaign is coming home to those who started it, and the people are resenting in no uncertain manner the slanders that have gone out over the country.

But Mr. Bloodgood is also discredited and my colleagues are vindicated by his loyalty organizations. I have shown that he is on the advisory board of the League of National Unity. Based on a petition of several hundred members, the league sent out a referendum to determine who would be acceptable as loyal Congressmen or Senators. I quote from the press report of a practically unanimous vote which was adopted and given out by authority from the New York headquarters, the 1st of June of this year.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONAL UNITY DEFINES "LOYALTY."

A loyal Congressman or Senator is a man who, "in or out of Congress since the declaration of war, has by word and act unreservedly supported and will support the Government in the vigorous prosecution of the war to a complete and decisive victory, and who has not attempted to destroy allied unity by attacks upon nations fighting with us against a common enemy." Measured by that test or any other logical test that would not bar Washington, Lincoln, and Wilson, our three war Presidents, Wisconsin's Congressmen, who have voted for 100 war measures and for all that have been offered, are "100 per cent Americans." [Applause.] Why is not Mr. Bloodgood ready to accept the judgment of the League of National Unity, of which he is a leading member, if "loyalty" is the motive behind his acts?

THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL AND ITS "ACID TEST" ANALYZED.

On March 30, 1917, one week before the declaration of war with Germany, the Journal, the leading Democratic paper of Wisconsin, printed a startling full-page advertisement with staring subheads addressed to Democrats, Republicans, and Socialists alike, of which the following is an extract:

Americans of the West * * *. You reelected President Wilson because he kept us out of war. Tell him with one voice he should still keep us out of war. The President and Congress are waiting to hear from you. They want to know definitely and immediately that the people of America do not want war. The President and Congress will be misled by your silence. You must speak up. You must tell your Congressman that you do not want war. Two cents now for a letter to your Congressman or a quarter for a telegram may save untold lives and treasure.

(Signed) EMERGENCY PEACE FEDERATION.

Five months before the Journal was strenuously supporting the President on the same definite proposition: "President Wilson should be reelected because he kept us out of war."

Pursuant to that great full-page appeal in the largest Democratic paper of Wisconsin, many hundreds of Democrats, Republicans, and Socialists instantly demanded of their different Representatives here by wire and letter that we vote against war. This appeal to voters is not read from Mr. Berger's paper in Milwaukee or from the Milwaukee Free Press or the Germania or the Sentinel or the News or the Wisconsin, most of whom are in turn lectured on "loyalty" by the Milwaukee Journal. That peremptory appeal came from the Democratic Milwaukee Journal, the administration's leading supporter in Wisconsin, whose editor shortly afterwards told the President, and, through the press, the country at large, of a widespread conspiracy in Wisconsin to defeat the draft law and overturn the military program of the Nation.

One week before the war the Journal was advising everybody in Wisconsin, by full-page advertisements, to write my colleagues to oppose the war. If it was disloyal, as the Journal intimates now, to vote against war when one's constituents so demanded, was it not doubly disloyal to permit this widespread appeal to Congress then, in order to influence its action, and by a paper that claimed to speak for the administration in Wisconsin to our people?

Possibly it may be contended there was no immediate connection between Mr. Nieman as publisher and editor and that a liberal fee could not be rejected or that the fee would have been rejected by the only 100 per cent American paper of the city if the fact had been known before printing. That possibility vanishes, because two days later, April 1, 1917, this powerful agency for good or harm printed another great appeal to the people of Wisconsin, Democrats, Republicans, and Socialists alike.

A full-page advertisement again appeared in the Milwaukee Journal on April 1, 1917, with staring headings and subheadings, from which I quote extracts:

To Americans of the West: Stand against war. The West reelected President Wilson because he kept us out of war. It is therefore up to the West to join with the peace forces of the East to keep us out of war. War is hell. * * *

Instruct your Congressman to accept mediation if it is offered and to encourage the President to try and bring the belligerents together. German militarism is crumbling. Let Congress hear from the West. Wire your Congressman and Senators; wire the President and the Cabinet. Flood Washington with hundreds of letters and thousands of telegrams against war. * * *

(Signed) EMERGENCY PEACE FEDERATION.

Pursuant to instructions, the Journal's readers "flooded Washington" with protests against war.

The great mass of people do not discriminate between editorials and other sentiments expressed in a paper and the full-page advertisements blew hot to thousands, however cold and calculating the editorial column. To make doubly sure that Congress would be flooded, deluged with protests showing the temper of Wisconsin constituents, on April 2, the following day, the Milwaukee Journal contained another and third advertisement—this time a half page—which closed with advice to its Wisconsin readers, "Write your Senators and Congressman, your President, demanding their practical aid to carry out a program of perpetual peace," and urging opposition to war.

This was the Milwaukee Journal's advice to its readers and its policy at a time when the whole country was torn with sensational reports and the grim issue of war was before us for decision. That my colleagues were deluged with letters and telegrams protesting against war is certain from my own experience, and no single agency it now appears contributed more to that result than the Milwaukee Journal, the administration's leading representative in our State.

THE WISCONSIN LEGISLATURE PROTESTS AGAINST WAR.

A few days prior to this flood of protests from Wisconsin the senate of Wisconsin unanimously, and the assembly by a vote of 56 to 17, passed resolution No. 31A, supported by Democrats and Republicans alike, addressed to the President and Congress. It declared—

That the people of Wisconsin have faith that the Government will do all things possible and consistent with the dignity of our Nation to prevent war, and the people of Wisconsin have implicit confidence in our Government, and will loyally support the Government in whatever action it may ultimately be necessary to take in the present international crisis.

The part emphasized is italic; the remainder is a sequence of any declaration of peace or war. Here was a solemn declaration sent from the Wisconsin State capitol a few days before Congress was called upon to act, from the great legislative body of the State—just from the people—saying our people had faith that the Government would do all things possible * * * "to prevent war." Congress alone declares war, and Congress alone was advised what the people expected of its Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, I will not pursue this line of discussion further, nor do I speak for my colleagues, because they are abundantly able to speak for themselves. We are now engaged in the greatest war the world has ever known, and according to the admonition contained in the resolution my colleagues from Wisconsin have supported the Government in every war measure whole-heartedly and loyally, but no man called upon to act could close his eyes on April 5, 1917, to the unpreparedness of this country for war, to the fact, as stated in the Milwaukee Journal, that "war is hell"; to the fact that hundreds of letters and telegrams, resulting from the Journal's efforts, were piled upon our desks protesting against war and that the Wisconsin State Legislature had practically unanimously declared the faith of the people of Wisconsin that their Representatives would do everything possible "to prevent war."

Neither Messrs. Nieman, Bloodgood, nor Goodland, nor ambitious candidates now seeking office, advised us in those trying times what they wanted, but the Journal, through great advertisements, was urging all of Wisconsin to write and telegraph us to "prevent war," the "issue on which President Wilson had been elected."

ALL ARE STANDING TOGETHER ON THE WAR.

No man need now say what the sentiment of the people then was, apart from the practically unanimous vote of Wisconsin's Legislature "to prevent war," the hundreds of letters and telegrams of protest received, and the reelection of President Wilson on that issue, as stated in the Journal. When war was declared it was my country's war, and I supported it unquestionably, giving all I could to that cause. An only son, who volunteered among the first, has been in France for many months, whose life, poor as I am, is worth more to me than all the worldly possessions of Messrs. Bloodgood and his associates put together. [Applause.]

A military company I organized years ago carried from Wisconsin 200 bright boys, including over 50 from my little home town, and that company is on the battle line in France.

Mr. Chairman, I had a direct ancestor killed in the Revolutionary War, one served in the War of 1812, and my father, now living, served three and a half years in a Wisconsin Cavalry regiment to save the Union; two uncles were wounded at Gettysburg in helping to hold back Lee's army that was invading the North, and I say with all modesty that as a youth I served my country 5 years in the Regular Army, and later 11 years more in the Wisconsin National Guard, retiring as judge advocate of the State. During the Spanish-American War, when not in service, I raised a provisional company and offered it to Gov. Scofield for service in that war. Let it not be inferred I claim credit whatsoever for this record of Americanism, but fiercely patriotic men, 4,000 miles away from danger, have so long raved about their superpatriotism through the press, and have demanded that all those who did not follow their example should be condemned, that it may be proper to compare records. Have Mr. Bloodgood and his associates or any ambitious congressional candidates in Wisconsin done anything more than I have done to help this country, both before and since war was declared?

Men who have jointly and severally bitterly criticized their home city and State repeatedly, and the congressional delegation continually, what have they done, now or heretofore, to create a united loyal people more than thousands of other citizens of Wisconsin? In what respect are they more loyal than my colleagues or myself?

Bloodgood said he gave his boys, or, as I am advised, they went without giving. I assume they are as good as my boy, or my colleague Mr. DAVIDSON'S boy, or 40,000 other Wisconsin boys now in France—and no better—but Bloodgood parades the fact of his "next of kin" continually throughout the press as evidence of superloyalty. If he had 1,000 boys there, he could not wipe out the "black spot" or injury he has done the good name of Wisconsin by outrageous slanders I have quoted—of firing squads, traitors, and threats of mob law in Wisconsin.

UNTRUE CHARGES AGAINST LOYALTY MUST BE REFUTED.

Mr. Chairman, I have tried briefly and temperately to discuss Mr. Bloodgood, who has grievously injured the people of my own State and tended to divide their efforts in securing united action on the war through his reckless statements and repeated threats, using his own superloyalty as a vehicle. I would that opportunity could be afforded me to show the moving cause of Bloodgood's hysteria and of his frantic attacks upon the loyalty of the State. Time will not permit, nor have I any desire to engage in any controversy with any paper or any individual. Men in public service are common subjects of fair and unfair criticism. Ordinarily criticisms pass unchallenged, but the Milwaukee Journal has continually charged disloyalty against Milwaukee, against Wisconsin, against Wisconsin's congressional delegation, and against the State legislature until to remain silent as to the State and individual libel is practically to countenance continued charges uttered through the news and editorial columns of the Journal.

At the outset of these remarks I referred to the fact that on June 7, 1917, according to press reports published throughout the country with staring headlines, Mr. Nieman, editor of the Milwaukee Journal, declared to the President that "an organized plot had been discovered in the State of Wisconsin to defeat the draft and to overthrow the military program of the Nation." This charge against the people of Wisconsin was made by Mr. Nieman shortly after he had received the statement from Bloodgood regarding Hoan and, as shown from the record before the military committee offered by Bloodgood, he and Mr. Nieman were "most active." On June 6, one day before Mr. Nieman's charge was made through the press of the country of an organized plot to overthrow the military program, the Milwaukee Journal, under a Madison date line, reported that "the State's draft registry then reached 218,700, or more than its estimated quota, and that the utmost quiet prevailed in Wisconsin." "From all over the State," the Journal article continued, "the utmost quiet and orderliness was reported, and the governor stayed up all night getting in returns." Yet, according to the press of the country, the following day the Journal's editor told the President in Washington that treason was rampant in Wisconsin and the Nation's military plans were to be thwarted in Wisconsin. The Attorney General of the United States wrote me a letter March 9, 1918, which was placed in the RECORD, saying that only one case had been started in the whole State of Wisconsin during the first year of the war for conspiracy in connection with the draft or other efforts to oppose the draft. Only one case among two and a half million people.

What more need be said of efforts to place a "black spot" on the State at a time when every rumor was magnified a hundredfold by hair-brained men throughout the country?

NOT ONE CASE OF RIOT, MOBS, OR DISORDER.

Since war was declared the Journal has filled the air with charges, sensational headlines, and bitter editorials. Yet not one case of riot, strikes, mobs, or attempts to blow up or destroy Government or private property was presented to the Attorney General's office, according to Mr. Gregory's letter.

What greater injury could befall the State than to have such unfounded statements as I have quoted given out to the press of the country by two men connected with the Council of Defense work. I will not quote at length to show the Journal's continual abuse of Wisconsin, the congressional delegation, State legislature, and governor. All these were common objects of attack, so that when on June 20, 1917, a few days after Mr. Nieman's statement to the President on Wisconsin's disloyalty, a two-column headline declared "A new disgrace for Wisconsin," it was no surprise to find that Wisconsin had been disgraced (?) because the assembly by a vote of 51 to 12 refused to incur the expense of printing 50,000 copies of the President's message. No one questions the value of the President's messages, but it is an abuse of press privileges to declare a State is disgraced because its assembly refused to print a certain number of copies of a certain message.

The quotation in the headline of the news article, followed by a caustic editorial, shows how far-fetched are repeated slanders and abuse of the State and of its officials by the leading Democratic paper of the State, which causes Bloodgood to see red at Washington, as well as in Milwaukee.

PARTISANSHIP RUN RIOT.

On June 22, two weeks after Mr. Nieman's interview on Wisconsin's disloyalty, the Journal, first page, first column, had a blazing headline, "G. O. P. drifting to copperheads," and quoting a Chicago paper, that a label of copperheadism is to be fastened upon the Republican Party because several Members of Congress from another State had met with editorial displeasure of that other paper.

The next day, June 23, the Journal under a heading "Truth in charge of copperhead," supported that infamous libel against the Republican Party of the country by quoting the alleged opinion of James G. Monahan as a chief expert. Mr. Monahan has been chief runner-up for the Congressman in his district in our State for 30 years, more or less, and he is found running again this year—a matter of habit rather than judgment.

I am reminded in this connection, through charges of "copperheadism" and "traitors" made for partisan purposes, of Walt Mason's homely philosophy on this general subject:

Dame Rumor is so busy, so drunkenly she swerves,
It keeps a fellow busy to follow all her curves;
She points to Dick and Harry and says they're traitors foul;
For facts we do not tarry; at once we start to howl.
To blast man's reputation by charges idly made
Won't help preserve the Nation or make the foe afraid.

THE TARNISHING OF A GOOD NAME.

I will pass over tales spread throughout the land, of rifles stored in Milwaukee to be used by antidraft men, and other stories of conspiracy and lawlessness which were circulated and helped injure the fair name of Milwaukee and of Wisconsin; of poisoned waters, powdered glass, poisoned court-plaster, and various other offenses, which were absolutely groundless, as shown by letters from the Attorney General inserted in the RECORD in an effort to quiet needless apprehension. Such offenses if existing should be punished to the full extent of the law, but these reports, which were sent out from Milwaukee, were no more reliable than the weird slanders I have mentioned which were published throughout the country.

Appearing in the Milwaukee Journal of date May 23 is an article under a New York date line stating, "There was a movement in Iowa to boycott Milwaukee goods. We had to go out and plead with them for aid of one sister State to another." This and much more from David W. Mae Willie, of Wisconsin, who tells of the effect on the country at large of slanders against Wisconsin. It was Bloodgood who threatened a firing squad or mob law in Wisconsin. Let me add, no Member of Congress from Wisconsin has failed to defend our State from the aspersions cast upon the State and city of Milwaukee by its detractors. The few brief examples noted could be supplemented with many other sensational declarations from the same sources, if needed, to show where and how "black spots" have been placed on Wisconsin.

I have no personal grievance with any man or any paper in my State or elsewhere and realize the great service performed by the American press; but I have sought to present a brief, clear, and temperate statement of where the trouble lies in Wisconsin.

Charges that an effort would be made in Wisconsin to hold up the draft and that mob law was needed in Milwaukee to punish traitors furnished inspiration for the bitter abuse of Wisconsin indulged in by Democratic papers and speakers during the recent senatorial campaign. Of course, imitators among men and papers repeat and republish every State calumny and have had part in the misrepresentation of Wisconsin and Wisconsin's loyalty, but inspiration has been furnished by central agencies which I have named.

Those who know the sources are not usually misled locally, but reckless, untruthful charges and misrepresentations can rarely be followed by the one injured, and where an entire State has been libeled the injury must be corrected by the people injured.

THE PERSECUTION OF MY COLLEAGUE, MR. NELSON.

I need not further enlarge upon this subject, but will remind the House of the malicious methods pursued in laying charges of conspiracy and disloyalty against my colleague, Mr. NELSON. Old-time political and personal opponents started the wheels of justice through unjust accusations affecting the loyalty of my colleague, who has a highly honorable record in this body and in the State and country. His membership on the great Judiciary Committee bespeaks his ability and high standing. When his case, after much delay, was called, over the objections and protests of NELSON'S enemies, who hoped, apparently, to have it contined over election, the trial judge administered a well-merited rebuke and threw the case out of court. That is the official record read to the House. The charge drew great headlines in the public press at the outset; the result was generally noted in inconspicuous, brief announcements or else ignored. That is a phase of Wisconsin politics.

The press carries great power, and when used with discretion it is a power for good, but when used as a personal or partisan weapon with which to carry on malicious attacks it not only does grievous harm to the individual and to the State but it lowers its own standard and influence.

GENUINE "NONPARTISANSHIP" NEEDED IN WISCONSIN.

I may properly call attention to one further editorial in the Milwaukee Journal, because it is frequently repeated at this time by the Journal and those who follow the Journal's policy. Under an editorial headed "Signs of the times," printed a few days ago, the Journal says: "A man who tries to talk politics these days is lost to all touch with his surroundings; the people simply will not be interested. Party politics is dead for the duration of the war."

In this connection it is safe to say the Journal carries more partisan political matter than all the other five Milwaukee dailies put together. With every Congressman, Senator, and State officer of the State a Republican, and a legislature overwhelmingly so, it is not hard to understand why the Journal seeks to make a fictitious issue of loyalty, and declares for nonpartisanship. Its opposition to the governor and entire congressional delegation is asserted to be based on "loyalty," but few are deceived by a publication that always has been and probably always will be bitterly partisan. Without any personal reflections let me say the Republicans in State and congressional service are as loyal, as steadfastly 100 per cent American, as Mr. Nieman or any other Democrat in the country, and that does not question his loyalty or the loyalty of any man. There should be no partisanship in loyalty.

Wisconsin elected a full Republican delegation and a full State ticket in 1916 by an overwhelming majority. If right to do so then, it is right now, and appeals made to Democrats as well as to Republicans in Wisconsin are justified by Republican candidates for Congress now.

NO ISSUE IN LOYALTY BECAUSE ALL ARE EQUALLY LOYAL.

The war overshadows all issues, but all men are supporting the war with equal sincerity and vigor. The question then occurs, why a Republican with valued experience who is in Congress should be chosen for the position over a Democratic candidate who wants to get in? In this connection the important legislative accomplishments and years of valued experience which have given some of my Wisconsin colleagues high position in the House may be ignored for purposes of the discussion. Let other logical reasons be offered that must appeal to the people of my State whatever may be their politics.

WHAT VITAL ISSUES EXIST TO-DAY?

The Milwaukee Journal asks, "Why partisanship" while the war is on? In Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina, Florida, and Arkansas, and in several other Southern States, there is no partisanship in peace or war. All are solidly Democratic. No Republican need apply in war or in times of peace. These States now control every committee and every chairmanship of importance in the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate. They determine all appropriations, and where the money is to be expended in peace or war, while the North contributes 90 per cent of all money used to pay the bills which will average several billion dollars annually in direct taxes for many years after the war is over. What more significant fact can be offered of present partisan political control the cry of "nonpartisanship" is urged?

The Republican Party has declared for a national budget, while our Democratic friends ignore their platform and the President's request for a single appropriation committee and cling to the antiquated, extravagant, squandering system that was never worse than now and fits in with the policy of "to the victor belong the spoils." Waste by the party in power reaching many millions of dollars, probably hundreds of millions annually, will be continued until the system is changed. Locality interests now govern many appropriations, like the lower Mississippi River and reclamation scheme, with its $200,000,000 for reclamation of private southern lands, and the Muscle Shoals $100,000,000 fertilizer power plant for Alabama, to be paid for by a direct Federal tax—yet every vote against the last Civil War veteran pension bill on June 7 last, less than a week ago, some 69 cast in all, was from these same States.

Wheat prices are fixed by Congress, but every effort to hold down or control the price of cotton is defeated by these same votes from southern States. Free trade has uniformly been the Democratic policy, particularly in the South, which now controls all committees and chairmanships, whereas Republicans have declared the difference in cost of production at home and abroad is required to protect labor and home industries. These are a few vital economic questions that divide the parties and in which the people of Wisconsin and the whole country, irrespective of politics, are vitally interested.

Because of close party caucus organization a Democratic Member is expected to be a "rubber stamp" or "regular" on all measures. My Republican colleagues have unanimously supported all war measures, as shown by the RECORD, but have not hesitated to expose delay, waste, or mismanagement whenever and wherever disclosed in war activities, and to thereby improve and expedite war operations, while in other fields not connected with the war a vigorous Republican minority in Congress has kept legislation from running riot. Democratic candidates have a clear field without any Republican opposition when in the South, but northern Republicans, whether voting for or against the war, have found Democratic leaders fighting in Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and other States, and cloaking their partisan fights by declaring that a vote for the Republican candidate is against the President or would give joy to the Kaiser, whereas the fight has been notoriously to control the House and Senate committees and committee chairmanships. The talk of nonpartisanship among Democratic leaders in the North exists where Republicans are in power. In all other districts, generally speaking, partisanship reigns, and whatever the Democratic Member's war votes may have been he is supported against any Republican.

THE ONLY WAY TO SECURE ECONOMIC REFORMS.

"Nonpartisanship" is voiced by the Journal, yet bitter partisanship is practiced, as disclosed in Wisconsin's recent senatorial campaign in the effort to defeat Senator LENROOT. Progressive Republicanism has never been extremely partisan, but it seems logical that northern Democrats as well as Republicans must follow ordinary public municipal and business economic methods in order to place the control of national expenditures with the sources of revenue. Northern Democrats have no committee chairmanships in Congress and little voice in their party's congressional deliberations. So there is only one way to insure this result—by the return of Republican Members, whose loyalty has been evidenced by their support of every war measure and is as certain as that of ambitious candidates without any records whatsoever. In 1916 a solid Republican delegation from Wisconsin was elected with over 100,000 combined plurality over their Democratic opponents, or 60,000 more than was polled for Mr. Hughes, the presidential candidate.

The MCLEMORE vote and every vote prior to the declaration of war was presumably approved by the electorate of the State through that election because that was the voice of the people. To-day Republicans are standing behind the President in the conduct of the war, as shown by the RECORD, unitedly, wholeheartedly, but we insist it is a national war and not a Democratic war and that any attempt to secure political advantage through the war, in the manner attempted in the Wisconsin senatorial election and in other northern elections and as proposed by Mr. Bloodgood and his associates in the coming fall primaries and election, is unwarranted and a libel on the people generally, who are all giving their boys and their money to help win the war. The people of Wisconsin resented spurious acid tests and repudiated speakers who sought the election of a Democratic Senator on the false issue of loyalty, and they will not fail to detect the same effort at the primaries and election in Wisconsin this fall.

JUDGMENT OF FAIR MEN NOT AFFECTED BY UNTRUE CHARGES.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to give a brief picture of Wisconsin partisan politics, which has had much to do with unfounded charges against the loyalty of my own State, its officials, including my colleagues, and its people generally. Those of us who are held here by official duties are unable to meet our detractors or critics face to face, but the judgment of our people in Wisconsin will not, in my opinion, be affected by unjust charges or insinuations, whatever may be the motive.

I hold no brief for my colleagues who have been selected for defeat by the Milwaukee Journal, Mr. Bloodgood, and his associates, and those through whom they locally work, but the people of Wisconsin will search for motives when asked to remove officials whose honorable position in this House and accomplishments here are known to the country and are now challenged for partisan purposes.

Wisconsin is loyal. Beyond all governmental demands we have furnished men and money for the war, and in all that can be offered in these trying hours of national stress Wisconsin is doing her full share. Politically we may differ and in that difference, which once rent two political parties of the State in twain, was born progressive legislation that made Wisconsin a pioneer among the States; but in our patriotism, our loyalty to our country, politics is put aside by the vast majority, who are united for winning the war and whose hearts follow our boys out into the trenches across the sea with prayers for their success.

Wisconsin has ever met and will meet every test and will do her part in bringing victory to American arms over Prussian militarism, with a lasting peace to the world. That is the will and purpose of the people of Wisconsin. Our country's cause above all. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair state how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 35 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wyoming 34 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that we will have any more speeches on this side.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, some time ago when we had the housing bill under consideration, calling for an expenditure of about $60,000,000, I ventured the suggestion that we would not have required the appropriation for the expenditure of that money if the war activities had been so coordinated that all sections of the country were given their proper proportion of the work; that because of the fact that contracts had been let in a small area throughout the country men were drawn away from other sections of the country and activities in industrial lines were closed. Men were thrown out of employment, whereas the creation of new activities in new places brought about not only congestion of men but required the construction of buildings in which to house them. At that time I suggested that there ought to be a better understanding of how the industries of the country should be treated, and that men should be employed where they could do the best work to promote the war; that idleness should not be created in one place and congestion in another; and that while contracts were being let along the seaboard and a great many of the Eastern States the Central West was being ignored and thousands of men in the West were idle and unable to find employment; that houses were empty, with no one to occupy them, and that on that account we were compelled to build houses in other places and draw upon the Treasury and increase the burden of taxation upon the people. I then ventured the view that the exercise of proper vision by the men in control of the administrative activities of the Government would have made such a condition unnecessary, and I rise to-day for the purpose of congratulating the administrative officials of the Government on seeing the light and realizing the need of doing the thing that I suggested upon that occasion.

I do not suppose that what I said had any weight—I am sure it did not—but I am glad to know that shortly after that the Shipping Board and its activities were moved to Philadelphia, where they ought to have been long before. I then suggested that the Food Administration ought to be sent to Chicago, in the center of the United States, where the food supply is furnished, instead of crowding people into huts and alleys and charging them fabulous prices for that sort of housing facility in the city of Washington, and that the Fuel Administration ought to be sent to Pittsburgh, in the center of the coal region. And that other activities should be sent to New York and other places, where their functions could be better performed than they could be in Washington, and I am pleased to see by an article published in this morning's Post this statement:

CHECK ON WAR ORDERS—GOVERNMENT TO STOP INDUSTRIAL CONGESTION IN THE EAST—NEW POLICY IS ANNOUNCED—WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD TO PLACE NEW ORDERS IN WEST AND SOUTH—INABILITY OF RAILROADS TO SUPPLY SUFFICIENT COAL IN EAST GIVEN AS CHIEF REASON—RELIEF EXPECTED.

To check further industrial congestion in the already overburdened East, the Government has prescribed a district in which it will permit no increase in the volume of war orders nor in the number of plants handling them.

This district includes New England, eastern and southern New York, eastern Pennsylvania to Williamsport and Altoona, New Jersey, Delaware, and eastern Maryland, excluding Baltimore.

TO SOUTH AND WEST.

The new policy, announced last night by the War Industries Board and the Fuel and Railroad Administrations, will tend to create expansion of industries in the middle West and South, although the process is expected to be so gradual as not to work any hardship on the eastern manufacturing area nor cause unusual industrial booms elsewhere.

The reason for the action, which already has been put into effect to some degree, is primarily the inability of the railroads to supply sufficient coal or to haul promptly all the manufactured products turned out by constantly growing industries. The shortage of labor in the East and the congested terminals of the Atlantic ports were contributory.

THE POLICY IN DETAIL.

The announcement of the policy follows:

"A policy has been adopted and made effective for preventing further increase in the volume of war orders and the number of establishments handling them in the area known as the congested manufacturing and transportation district. This district comprises the New England States, eastern and southern New York, Pennsylvania as far west as Williamsport and Altoona, all of New Jersey and Delaware, and eastern Maryland, not including Baltimore.

"Exceptions to this policy will be made only if unavoidable through inability otherwise to provide for war needs.

"The congested district comprises those Eastern States in which so large a proportion of war industries is located as to make it difficult to supply all the necessary raw materials and fuel. This difficulty obtains because coal for these industries is mined in the territory west of the Allegheny Mountains. It must be carried into this congested district by a limited number of railway lines and by ships from Hampton Roads and Baltimore.

COAL TRANSPORTATION LIMITED.

"The amount of coal, therefore, which can be transported into this congested area during any one season is limited, and is an entirely separate problem from the production of coal. However, much coal is mined in western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio. Only so much is available for this congested district as the railroads and ships can transport into it.

"Careful analysis of the possible coal movement shows that the increased industrial activity in the Eastern States has created a requirement for coal which exceeds the limit of possible transportation of coal plus necessary materials for manufacture. A map of the congested and restricted districts has been issued to all Government departments."

Execution of the new policy will be largely in the hands of the War Industries Board. This does not mean that any idleness of manufacturing plants in the restricted districts is to be permitted.

EFFECT IS MANIFOLD.

The effect hoped for by the Government is manifold. First, railroads of the East will be relieved of the demoralizing influence of a greater demand for coal than it is physically possible to transport. Similarly, railways will not have increased amounts of finished war munitions and supplies to carry. Consequent improvement in the ability of the railways to operate normally will result in fewer freight embargoes.

The labor problem also will be affected. Labor advisors of the Government have found one of their most difficult questions in the lure of labor to new war industries.

DOES NOT AFFECT SHIPYARDS.

So far as the shipyards are concerned, this situation can not be improved much by the new policy.

More equal distribution of manufacturing will enable the Shipping Board and Railroad Administration better to carry out the policy of routing more export shipments through south Atlantic and Gulf ports.

In locating contracts, officials will not let the argument of location outside the congested area dominate questions of price. Manufacturers will have to improve their manufacturing facilities and reduce their prices at least to near those of other manufacturers.

So they have decided to divide the country up into zones of activity, and they propose to let contracts to industrial institutions within the zone and employ labor where it will be at home and where they can get the war needs supplied as they have not been able to get them supplied up to now, and when they have carried this to a successful conclusion they will be able to economize in the expenditures we are called upon to make for the war. While they have been trying to do everything in two or three little places in the United States they have ignored the great body of the country in the letting of contracts for the development of war needs. The city of Chicago, the great imperial city of the Central West, with its two and a half millions of people, with its 39 great trunk lines of railroads, representing over 180,000 miles of railroad entering into the heart of the American Continent, reaching every farm almost in the land where food supplies are raised, within the borders of this great city are to be found great manufacturing institutions capable of building any kind of plant, any kind of machinery needed for the conduct of the war. There are other great cities in the Central West that have been ignored, and while the State of Illinois paid in 1916 $90,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States it was given no consideration whatever in the preparation of things that are needed for the proper conduct of the war. I am glad that the War Industries Board has finally opened its eyes; that it has seen the light of day; that it understands that America does not consist of a few places along the seaboard; that places where men and women live and work and do are not within the confines of two or three States; that there are other States in the Union; that they have men of genius, brains, brawn, and money, and facilities to help in this great war; that while they are willing to give their boys and send them to the front and spill their blood and spend their money, they have an equal right to expect participation in the activities that are needed in the successful conduct of the war. A few more acts like this proposed by the War Industries Board will lead to a coordination of the activities of the country, so that we may be prepared to meet the great crisis that is before us in such a way as to insure to the American people victory in the war. We have, they say, over 700,000 men abroad already on the battle line. We have more than twice that many on the American Continent prepared to go. Have we the facilities to supply them with the needs to win the war? If we have not, we ought to have them, and if we have not those facilities it is because the men who have had control of the letting of contracts have not had the foresight to utilize all the facilities that America has and which they could employ. They have employed such facilities as their favoritism dictated, and they have expended money beyond what they should have expended for the results they have obtained. They have not economized in the way that they should have economized; they have practiced extravagance where economy should have been practiced.

If these activities were coordinated and properly distributed, much greater results could have been obtained and more economy resulted, and to-day, instead of being only half prepared to meet the great responsibilities that are placed upon us by the war, we would have been fully prepared. No man or woman in America would need to have any doubt about what the result of our activities are going to be abroad if we had met the situation as it should have been met without fear, favor, or favoritism, and to-day, let us hope, is but the beginning of a new era; let us hope that this article published in this morning's Post is but the first announcement of a determination on the part of the administration officials that the war is to be won and that every man and every instrumentality in the United States is to be utilized and that no favoritism henceforth is to be played. Let us hope that we have reached the hour when we can bid good night to the day that is gone and welcome the dawn of the coming day, when every American may realize that the Commander in Chief of the American Army is surrounded by men filled with the desire and the kind of patriotism that will compel them and impel them to do the thing that will bring victory to the American arms at the earliest possible date. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to say a few words on a subject not connected with this bill. I have not had time nor opportunity to prepare a careful statement on the subject. I am utilizing these few minutes because in the crowded condition of legislation it may be impossible for me to get the necessary time to deal with the subject at length. I have in mind the decision of the Supreme Court on the child-labor law. Lawyers differ as to the right of the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. A good many brilliant lawyers are of the opinion that this power has never really been vested in the Supreme Court. The very first time the Supreme Court exercised that power was in the case of Marbury against Madison, in 1803.

Jefferson mercilessly criticized the court and denied its right to declare an act of Congress invalid. Justice Clark, chief justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, stands out among the prominent jurists who believed that this power has never been conferred upon the court.

But whatever the opinions of lawyers may be—and lawyers will always differ, as it is their training to split hairs, to differentiate, to find distinctions, and to reason things out theoretically and abstractedly and altogether out of relation to existing things and to live more or less in the past—the predominance of the lawyer in social and economic legislation is nothing short of calamity. Carlyle referred to lawyers' reasoning as chop logic. The lawyer takes a thought and differentiates and distinguishes and qualifies until there is nothing left of the original idea. Whatever the opinion of lawyers may be as to the right of the court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, one thing is certain, that if this decision remains the law of the land it will be impossible for the National Legislature, for Congress, to cure by legislation any of the social or industrial evils which legislation in all civilized countries of the world tries to meet.

It will throw back into the industrial field all the groups that are contending for the right to exist, all the economic classes that necessarily exist in modern society, and among whom there is a ceaseless clash of interests. Instead of the national will asserting itself through the act of the national supreme body, of the legislature, all the industrial clashes will have to find expressions in the industrial field solely, with all the bitterness, with all the cruelties, with all the horrors that industrial strife involves, and with all disturbances to society. Outside of the general cardinal principles of the moral law, those principles that are found in the Decalogue, legislation has at all times represented the rule of one group of society over the other as curbed or tempered by the power and influence of the other group. Thus for centuries in England, in all the countries of the European Continent, the landholding class has practically controlled legislation. In the early history of these United States the property holder enjoyed an influence in legislation far superior to what the numbers constituting that class were justified in exercising. As late as 1842 the famous Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island was the final stage in the conflict between those who believed that political power resided in every citizen and every man, irrespective of whether he owned real estate or not, and those who believed otherwise. In Rhode Island, under an old charter, the right of primogeniture was preserved and only landowners and their first born were entitled to vote up to 1842.

What is tariff legislation except class legislation, in which certain interests which benefit by tariffs speak in the name of the entire people?

The opposition comes from that portion of the community for whom free trade is more desirable, and who also speak in the name of the entire people. In labor legislation the situation becomes quite clear. It is usually legislation on behalf of the masses, of large numbers, as against a smaller group, which enjoys a greater share of worldly goods and very often the greater share of knowledge and intelligence, and who, by reason thereof, think themselves the only competent element of society to guide the destinies of the Nation.

If the decision of the Supreme Court is to remain law, it will be impossible for the National Legislature to take up child-labor legislation, legislation on behalf of women, legislation calculated to modify or to change or to improve conditions in industry.

The Official Bulletin this morning or yesterday contained a very interesting item that says that since the decision of the Supreme Court the Department of Labor has been flooded with telegrams of inquiry from employers throughout the country whether they are now free to employ children under the age of 14 or 16 in the mines and in factories, and these requests show so much anxiety that they are usually accompanied by the statement, "Wire reply collect."

It is evident that this decision can not be permitted to stand as law unless the entire course of social legislation is to be turned back, which no nation developing normally and developing rapidly, as the United States have been developing lately, can afford. Now, what is to be done?

FRANCE HAS A CONSTITUTION.

There was a conflict in France between the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate for years as to the respective powers of the two legislative bodies. There is a conflict in England between the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and the House of Commons is all the time gaining at the expense of the House of Lords. And it is very likely that one of the results of this war will be the complete disappearance of the House of Lords, so that the British legislature, instead of being bicameral, will consist of one body.

How can we overcome that conflict between the three branches of the Government? Is the Supreme Court to nullify the legislation of Congress? Is the court to tell the Legislature what the Legislature intended to do? That is what it amounts to, because the Legislature can not be assumed to have willfully committed an act contrary to their oath of office and contrary to the Constitution. By a majority of one the court nullified the will of the elected Representatives of the people. How is this conflict to be avoided. Half a dozen suggestions have been made. Somebody has suggested that every law which we consider of vital importance should be accompanied by a statement that the Supreme Court should have no power——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. That very law should be accompanied by the statement that the Supreme Court shall have no power to declare it unconstitutional. Another remedy proposed is that the Supreme Court, which has appellate jurisdiction, shall be deprived of the opportunity to have matters involving the constitutionality of Federal statutes brought up before them on appeal.

There is, again, the suggestion made that the decisions of the court may be revoked by a referendum to the people, and finally that an amendment to the Constitution itself should be adopted to the effect that nothing contained in the Constitution shall be so construed as to authorize the Supreme Court to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional. Something must be done. We can not afford to deprive the National Legislature of the power to deal with great social and industrial problems. Perhaps it would be a good thing for Congress to appoint a select committee to study the entire problem and present a remedy. This matter can not be left in the condition which it is in to-day. We can not permit a state of affairs where, by a majority of one, the Supreme Court can nullify an act of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and of the President of the United States. We can not permit a repetition of the horrible effect which followed the Dred Scott decision. This is perhaps a poor analogy, because it is hardly likely that anything that can happen in America to-day will ever bring about the same disastrous result. The situation is extremely serious and Congress should not delay in taking up the matter in the most thoroughgoing manner and face the problem in a brave way, so that we will be able to go to the people at an early opportunity and tell them that we have found a remedy for avoiding the possibility of one judge of the Supreme Court vetoing the legislation of Congress. The Constitution has carefully circumscribed the power of the President to veto the action of Congress by enabling a two-thirds majority of Congress to override the President's veto.

And then do not forget that Members of Congress and the President are elected by the people and can be recalled by the people, while Supreme Court judges are appointed for life.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has read the case of Marbury against Madison?

Mr. LONDON. I have.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has the gentleman ever undertaken to answer the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall in that case? I have heard a great many gentlemen inveigh against the usurpation, as they claim, of power by the Supreme Court to declare unconstitutional an act of Congress, but I have never heard any one of those gentlemen undertake to answer the reasoning of the court by which that decision is sustained.

Mr. LONDON. Well, as I said before, it is impossible for one lawyer to satisfy the mind of the other. Five judges of the Supreme Court have differed with four judges of the Supreme Court on this very question of the constitutionality of the child-labor law. The most important cases before the Supreme Court, involving most vital rights, have very seldom been decided unanimously.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Perhaps the gentleman would be interested to know that the decision of Marbury against Madison has been consistently followed and has been frequently cited by all the new governments on this hemisphere that have copied their form of government from ours, and they all accept the point that the doctrine of that case is essential to any government that recognizes law as the supreme force.

Mr. LONDON. It is entirely true that the American Constitution has been copied by new republics established since the foundation of this Republic, and I am more or less familiar with the decisions which have followed that well-known case of 1803.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman give me one minute more to answer that question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. LONDON. We are dealing with the year 1918. The fact that other countries have benefited by our experience should not prevent us from gaining by our own experience.

A situation has arisen where we have a conflict between what are supposed to be three coordinate branches of the Government. Does the gentleman mean to say that Congress is not to do anything about it and just take a chance that any act it may pass, no matter how important, no matter how far-reaching in its effect, may be nullified by one man in the Supreme Court?

Mr. SANFORD. May I say to the gentleman in reply that Congress has the alternative of continuing to exist in a Government by law, or else the Supreme Court may be abolished and we would immediately proceed to be Bolsheviki, and we would be the Bolsheviki.

Mr. LONDON. That sort of reasoning is below the gentleman.

Mr. SANFORD. That would be the effect.

Mr. LONDON. England, a country of law, exists without that power vested in its courts, and France exists as a country of law without that power in its constitution. The gentleman would not deny that France and England and Switzerland and other civilized countries are governed by law. What the gentleman does contend for is this, that a law as laid down in 1787 should be the law for all time, no matter what lessons the present may teach us. That is the trouble with the gentleman. When he speaks of law, as we have it now, he speaks of it as though it had been handed down from Mount Sinai and was absolutely unchangeable. The difference between a human being and an animal is just this, that the animal never changes and the human being does.

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 15 minutes.

RECLAMATION.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, as the sundry civil bill now before the House is the bill which provides for appropriations or allotments for the United States reclamation projects, I deem it pertinent to have read in my time a letter that I have received from Mr. J. H. Upton, the president of the Oregon Irrigation Congress, a man who has given the subject of irrigation and reclamation of arid lands a great deal of study, a great deal of attention. He writes me concerning the establishment of homes for returning soldiers by the irrigation of the arid lands.

Before having this letter read I wish to say that I regret very much that the limitations of the law only permit this committee to recommend an appropriation at this time of some $9,000,000 for the irrigation of the arid lands of the West, and that is confined to existing projects. The committee is limited in its expenditures to the reclamation fund. The reclamation fund comes from the sale of the land in the 16 public-land States, so it is necessarily limited. It does seem to me that this administration ought to profit by the success heretofore had in the reclamation of the arid lands and the operation of that act as conducted by the Reclamation Service.

Last year there were raised upon the Government reclamation projects over $50,000,000 worth of crops, $50 to each acre under cultivation, $30 an acre more than the average raised on all the farms of the country, as shown by the last census report. It does seem to me that this administration ought to adventure upon some comprehensive plan of either increasing the reclamation fund or adopting some legislation such as the Smith-Chamberlain bill, which is designed to put the Government behind some of these bond issues in the Western States, and thereby put in cultivation and under irrigation some of the 17,000,000 acres of arid lands of the West that can be made to produce from 30 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre, or other food equivalents.

The people in my State, in my district, are doing the best they can with limited means, but on account of war conditions they are able to finance but few of these projects. They have actually gone out this year in Malheur County and sold irrigation bonds in the same way that the Government has gone out and sold its liberty bonds, by appealing to the patriotism of the community to increase food production. On the Warm Springs project, in Malheur County, Oreg., in that manner they expect to sell this summer some $500,000 worth of bonds and have under irrigation next year over 20,000 acres of land that will produce from 30 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre, or its equivalent in other food products. In the Jordan Valley, in Malheur County, we have inaugurated a project this year that will require an expenditure of $2,000,000 and which will irrigate 40,000 acres. Last year on the Ochoco project, near Prineville, in Crook County, they raised $900,000 by a bond issue. They will have under irrigation this fall on the Ochoco project over 20,000 acres of land which will produce from 30 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre, or its equivalent in other food products.

We are thus financing these three projects to the extent of $3,400,000, within $900,000 of the total received by Oregon from the reclamation fund at the end of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1917, while up to the same time Oregon has paid into the reclamation fund nearly $11,000,000.

I will now ask the Clerk to read the letter that I referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"OREGON IRRIGATION CONGRESS,
"Prineville, Oreg.

"Hon. N. J. SINNOTT, M. C.,
"Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: As one of the citizens of Oregon interested in its development and growth, and as a patriotic citizen imbued with a desire to reward the soldiers of our Nation who are braving their breasts on foreign battle fields to the devastating savagery of the soulless and godless Huns, I am suggesting to you a plan to which I would ask you to give your serious consideration and to aid in every manner possible its dissemination through such channels of publicity as may be open to you.

"Let Oregon start this great plan.

"We are spending billions for devastation and destruction.

"Let us spend a billion for gratitude and construction.

"The people of the United States are so busily engaged in raising an Army of proper proportions and in equipping and transporting them to the fighting zone that we seem to be overlooking the vital question of providing for those who will soon be returned to their home land, disabled from disease and wounds.

"It seems to be a habit in America to wait for emergencies to arise before attempting to take care of them.

"While we are raising and spending billions of dollars to kill the Hun—an operation which will necessarily mean that thousands of our own boys will be wounded, disabled, and maimed—we have not yet begun to prepare for taking care of them after they are discharged from the hospitals provided for their immediate care.

"I am informed that there are 9,000 wounded and disabled soldiers in the Province of British Columbia alone—men who a short time ago left their homes in perfect physical condition, but who are now unable to perform military service or to resume their usual occupations. I am also advised that in British Columbia all interned enemies have been put to work in the clearing and improvement of public lands which the Canadian Government will distribute to its discharged soldiers, while those unfit for military duty on the front are put over them as guards, who see that the internes perform the necessary work in improving the land ready for occupancy and use when the soldiers are returned to it. In this way the enemies at home are compelled to work, but they also work under supervision of those who have a direct interest in getting the land in fit shape for their subsequent use.

"After several years of Army life, amid new countries and new scenes, facing death in its many horrible forms and undergoing the most nerve-wrecking and physical hardships, a large majority of our boys will welcome a retreat to the quiet and repose of rural life. Many men, highly skilled in various trades and accustomed to hard work, will not be able to return to their former occupations because of the change of viewpoint which the toils and hardships of war has brought about.

"As an economic and as a patriotic policy a solution of this problem, which will be upon us as a Nation within a few weeks following the first great battle in which our soldiers engage, should be worked out and put into effect.

"After the Civil War the situation, serious then but not comparable to the magnitude of the one confronting this country now, was taken care of by the settlement of public lands by means of the soldiers' homestead. This policy can not be renewed, for the reason that practically all of the good land upon which a man can make a living has been taken up.

"It would be a crime to place the returned soldiers out upon the large portion of the lands that are yet the public domain.

"We spend many billions of dollars in the purchase of cannon and ammunition and in building barracks and clothing, all of which will be worn out or destroyed during the course of the war. Would it not be good economy to spend only one of these many billions of dollars in taking care of our boys when they get back or in giving them an opportunity to start life anew when their struggle is over?

"My suggestion is that there be set aside in each of the Western States 1,000,000 acres of land. That the United States build the necessary irrigation systems to properly irrigate this land and clear it and improve it ready for use and occupancy. That in such reclamation they expend in the neighborhood of $50 per acre, making a total of about half a billion dollars, and that another half a billion be set aside to loan to these men for the purchase of farm equipment and stock. That they be allowed the use of this money for 25 years without interest, the whole to be paid back at approximately the end of that period of time. The land to be divided into 40-acre tracts and sold to men who are going to actually live upon the land. All of the interned enemies could be put to work in the improvement of the land and the building of the necessary works and the returned disabled soldiers put in charge of the construction camps. There are immense areas of land in each of the Western States that by the application of water could be made veritable garden spots, but which without water are desert wastes. Such a colonization would not only develop and enrich the West, but would be an exemplification of the gratitude of a thankful Nation to the heroes who are sacrificing their all upon the altar of our country.

"If this plan can be carried to successful fruition, the West will be peopled by the very best blood of our Nation and a multitude of returned heroes and their posterity for time to come will be comforted, cheered, and made to realize that the people at home are in part as unselfish and generous as the noble men who have already and are still giving their opportunities and lives to 'our country'—yours and mine.

"Oregon has been first in every endeavor for the prosecution of this war. Let us all help to make Oregon first in the realization of a grateful Nation of the debt we owe our heroes.

"Yours, very truly,

"JAY H. UPTON,
"President Oregon Irrigation Congress."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, Secretary Lane has sent this week to the Members of Congress a very appealing and eloquent letter somewhat along the lines of Mr. Upton's letter, which has just been read, advocating the reclamation of the arid lands in the West and the reclamation and drainage of the swamp lands in the South for the purpose of making homes for the returning soldiers. He tells us how the returning soldiers after the Civil War were easily and readily absorbed back into the civil life of the country, largely because the public lands of the West were open to homestead entry, due to the fact that the homestead law was passed in the early sixties. By reclaiming the arid lands in the West and draining the swamp lands in the South the same ready absorption of the soldiers can be had when they return from "over there," and it does seem to me that this administration ought to pay heed to the advice of Secretary Lane in his letter recently sent to the various Members of Congress.

Yearly since I have been in Congress Secretary Lane, with his broad vision and knowledge of the West and his knowledge of what can be done by the reclamation of these arid lands, has given similar advice to Congress and to his chief; but it seems that as often as he gives this advice it is ignored, his letters are pigeonholed, and no action follows. The administration does nothing to enlarge the activities of the Reclamation Service or to increase the reclamation fund.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. There is carried in this bill an item of $100,000 for investigations in public-land States, and an item of $100,000 for investigations outside of the public-land States, covering these questions.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think that is only a drop in the bucket. It may provide for some superficial investigations and reports that will be pigeonholed, just as the reports from Oregon have been. We have spent $100,000 in investigation in my own State, in my own district—$50,000 by the General Government and $50,000 by the State—and there has been no new reclamation work in the State since those investigations have been made. We want something more than investigations. I would like to see Congress and I would like to see the President give some attention to these repeated letters and recommendations from Secretary Lane. The Secretary is conversant with the matter, but his is the "voice of one crying in the wilderness." His advice comes in here and is repeatedly ignored and pigeonholed.

Some one has said that some people think they pay a debt to virtue by merely praising it, and it appears that as far as this administration is concerned it comes within that principle when reclamation is considered. They feel that they have paid all their obligations to the arid lands of the West and to the demand for reclamation when some letter is sent in like this one by Secretary Lane, letters which are pigeonholed after they come in. They praise reclamation; but that is all it ever amounts to. Nothing is done in a legislative way to increase, as they should increase the activities of the reclamation service, either by enlarging the reclamation fund or by passing the Smith-Chamberlain bill, which is designed to enable the Government to get behind the bond issues of the various States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I had the letter of Secretary Lane put in the RECORD day before yesterday.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is in the RECORD?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. And it will sleep in the RECORD, and as far as the administration is concerned, if the record of the past is a criterion, you will see that no activity will be had in relation to the matter, and we shall still be confined to the limited moneys in the reclamation fund for future development unless more attention is paid to Secretary Lane's yearly recommendations than has been paid in the past.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman from Wyoming wish to use any more time?

Mr. MONDELL. I have no further requests for time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs and preservation: For repairs and preservation of all completed and occupied public buildings and the grounds thereof, under the control of the Treasury Department, and for wire partitions and fly screens therefor, Government wharves and piers under the control of the Treasury Department, together with the necessary dredging adjacent thereto, buildings and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in renting said wharf, require that the lessee shall make all necessary repairs thereto; care of vacant sites under the control of the Treasury Department, such as necessary fences, filling dangerous holes, cutting grass and weeds, but not for any permanent improvements thereon; repairs and preservation of buildings not reserved by vendors on sites under the control of the Treasury Department acquired for public buildings or the enlargement of public buildings, the expenditures on this account for the current fiscal year not to exceed 15 per cent of the annual rentals of such buildings: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated not exceeding $125,000 may be used for marine hospitals and quarantine stations and completed and occupied outbuildings, including wire partitions and fly screens for same, and not exceeding $14,000 for the Treasury, Butler, Winder, and Auditors Buildings at Washington, D. C.: Provided further, That this sum shall not be available for payment for personal services except for work done by contract or for temporary job labor under exigency not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building, $1,000,000: Provided further, That not to exceed $200,000 of the appropriation in this paragraph may be expended for altering and remodeling completed and occupied public buildings outside the District of Columbia other than marine hospitals and quarantine stations.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee, apart from the provisions of this bill, with reference to the structures that are being put up in Potomac Park, I think for the Navy and perhaps also for the War Department. Can the gentleman state whether these are contemplated to be temporary or permanent buildings?

Mr. SHERLEY. They are neither temporary nor permanent in the full sense of those terms. When provision was made for those buildings the gentleman will recall that I made the statement that they were intended to be fireproof concrete buildings, with the object that they should not permanently remain there and yet remain there such a length of time as to free the Government from being at the mercy of the private owners of buildings here in the District. After the war there will necessarily be need for space for quite a considerable period while we are planning for permanent structures for the increase of the Government that will necessarily remain after the war. These buildings will not be unattractive. There is a good deal of structure there incident to the erection of the buildings that will disappear in the course of a month or two, and when the buildings are completed it will not obstruct the view as it is now obstructed.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman does not favor permanently taking up that park by structures of that nature?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not favor it, and if the committee at the time the buildings were authorized could have found any available site which could have been used we would not have thought of using that land.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman does not think the vacant property in front of the Union Station might be utilized, where there is excellent street car service?

Mr. SHERLEY. That was all gone into at the time, and it was not thought adequate for the buildings of the size and character the gentleman has referred to. Besides that, it was a considerable distance from the other governmental activities. In addition to that, I think very likely the housing commission will use that space for housing Government employees.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am entirely in sympathy with the gentleman's statements, but as I have viewed the work of construction, I thought they were being built in a way that would permit their remaining there until all of us have been under the ground for some time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope not, and yet I think the buildings may remain there for five years or so.

Mr. CRAMTON. It would be greatly to be regretted to have the parks permanently disfigured by these buildings, especially in view of the fact that they are not in a location that is readily accessible by the public and by the employees. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of all necessary employees, other than employees required for the administrative work of the bureau of the class provided for and specified in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919, and plate printers and plate printers' assistants, $1,731,600, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denomination than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act "to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1900.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 8, after the word "assistants," strike out the figures "$1,731,600" and insert "$2,039,118."

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation has to do with the men and women working in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. When I came to Washington I heard many rumors about the unwholesome and unfair conditions in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Just about a year ago I was requested to make an investigation of conditions in that bureau. After thoroughly investigating those conditions I brought the facts before the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo. He appointed a committee to further investigate the conditions of the girls' work in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and after a hearing which lasted less than three hours the committee made a supplementary report to Mr. McAdoo declaring that all workers in the bureau should be put on an eight-hour basis. This was done. We found from the report made to me by Mr. Ralph, Director of the Bureau, that there were over 400 girls in the bureau whose time he was going to shorten from 13 hours to 12 hours a day. We found that he had working over 400 women on night duty on a 12-hour shift.

He offered to reduce the hours of 18 women from 13 to 14 hours a day. We found that this work had continued for several months before war was declared. These conditions, humanity decided, should not continue. We also found many other conditions that had to be changed. For instance, Mr. Ralph had taken away from the girls their annual leave. He had also refused to give them permission to be transferred to other departments. These conditions were changed, but there was nothing we could do about the pay that these girls were receiving. Two dollars and twenty-four cents a day, or $700 a year, was the highest wage that the girls could attain except when they were put in charge of a division. We found many girls who had been working in the bureau 15 to 20 years and were receiving only $700 a year. These girls are employed as common laborers. I think that is the head under which their work is done, but as a matter of fact it is very skilled labor and very hard on those who are performing the work. For instance, in the examining room they have to examine every bill and know whether it is perfect. Every bit of work that is done in the bureau is counted. The mental strain of counting continually for 8 hours a day, and at times 12 hours a day, is more than most of the girls can stand.

In the numbering and examining division the women have to have their eyes examined very often, because of the strain upon them. This work can not be done by unskilled labor. It takes many years of training to work up to the positions which those girls occupied when they were receiving $700 a year, and this appropriation will simply increase the amount which the director of the bureau may give to these women, who are now receiving, some of them, $1.92 a day, and a great majority $2.24 a day. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, there are several basic facts that ought to be understood in connection with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, because they apply not only to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing but to a number of other places. Congress can not undertake to determine wisely all the details of administration of a manufacturing establishment such as that. There has not been for a number of years any limitation of law upon the Secretary of the Treasury as to what wages should be paid to the employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. He annually has submitted estimates for the running of that institution, and whenever in the judgment of those responsible for that institution additional money was needed because of desirable increases in wages, the duty was plain upon those people to present the estimates and the reason therefor to the Congress. Some time ago the women employees engaged in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing asked an opportunity to be heard before the Committee on Appropriations, and they came before us representing their cause. On behalf of the committee I said to them what I am saying now to the House, that I thought it was the duty of the administrative officers of that institution to exercise the proper courage to advise Congress as to what moneys were necessary for proper salaries there, and then Congress would exercise its judgment as to whether or not it would allow the moneys that were asked, but that the constant effort to sidetrack matters by saying "We have not the money" or "Congress will not let us do this" was a situation that had no justification. As a result of that statement these ladies evidently went to the gentleman in charge of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and presumably he to the Secretary of the Treasury, and an additional estimate was submitted to Congress, an estimate in amount that bears no relation to what this director previously had testified was what was needed in order to pay proper salaries. In other words, the director has not performed, other than as may be judged by the submission of estimates, the function that rests upon him to perform of determining, as the administrative officer, what wages ought to be paid down there and asking the money for it. What he practically has done has been to take the statement submitted to him and send it to us, saying, "We need so much money to do certain things," but his positive testimony before the committee does not warrant us in the belief that he believes that that should be done.

This is what the committee has done. It has increased this item by $100,000 instead of increasing it, as requested by Mr. Wilmeth, $399,118—that is, as requested by him in his supplemental estimates, not as requested by him in his statement as to what wages ought to be paid or what the necessities of the case demanded—and we arrived at that sum in this way. It will enable the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, if he administers his office properly, to see to it that none of the women work for less than $2.24 a day, plus the $120 a year that will be given to them along with other employees of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not long ago the director increased the wages of a number of people down there to the extent of about $45,000.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment; and it is interesting to note how he went about it. He increased the pay of people who were getting $5, $6, $7, and $8 a day, and then had a little money over and increased some from $1.75 to $1.92 a day, those latter being the assistants to the plate printers. That is not my conception of the way to run that bureau. There are a lot of people down there who are getting all of the money that they ought to get and some who are not getting what they ought to get. We have not undertaken to determine just who should be increased except in this way: We have given to him money enough to do the things necessary to be done, and to pay a salary in every instance which shall not be less than $2.24 a day plus the $120 a year. These people a few weeks ago were getting $1.75 a day. They were then increased to $1.92 a day, but they can be raised by him under the provisions that we are making to $2.24 a day and will get what amounts to approximately 40 cents a day in addition to the $120 a year. In other words, they will have been raised from a pay of $1.75 to about $2.65, an increase of nearly $1 a day.

Everyone has his ideas, and they differ according to individuals as to what amount of money shall be paid to different folk for work. Unfortunately in life the capacity to desire and to suffer bears no relationship to the capacity to earn, and man being sentient frequently suffers out of all proportion to his ability to ease his sufferings. An idealistic government might be such a government in which everybody would be given sufficient to enable him to satisfy his desires without regard to his capacity and what he in turn gives to society, but we are not living in an idealistic government, and we never can, and it is perfectly impossible to ever base wages upon the desires of people instead of what they give to society for the wage that they receive.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. We have tried to do what we believe was not a charitable thing but an equitable thing, not simply out of sympathy to people but out of justice to people. I think these women are entitled to get a minimum wage of at least $2.24 with this bonus added. We have provided that they shall, but we have not undertaken to adopt the policies of a number of people to increase everybody without regard to what they are now earning. I will now yield to the lady from Montana.

Miss RANKIN. The gentleman has answered my question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. CARLIN. I wanted to ask the gentleman if the demand for the increase of wages by the employees of the bureau did not come to the superintendent subsequent to his testifying before the committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not know whether it did or did not, and I do not care. If he is fit for his job he ought to know what these people are entitled to be paid, and ought to request that amount of money.

Mr. CARLIN. I asked for information——

Mr. SHERLEY. I really do not know; I will say to the gentleman, I do not recall.

Mr. CARLIN. This estimate submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, does it bear the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, it bore it to the extent that it bears a short note signed by Mr. Moyle, Acting Secretary, in which he states:

> Inclosed herewith is a letter from the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, setting forth in detail the present rates of pay and the rates recommended for the year 1919. The work of these employees involves both care and responsibility, is worth more than is being paid, and the bureau is without sufficient funds to make the proposed increase in their compensation.

This letter, if not in general language, does not say and recommend just what they ought to have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the lady from Montana will prevail. I have been doing my best for the past two years to try to get a measure passed here, a minimum wage bill, to take care of the men and women in the Government service who deserve first consideration at the hands of Congress. Two years ago the Committee on Labor held extensive investigations, and we found the situation in the Government service both in Washington and throughout the country where men and women were working for wages set in 1854. There are a great many of these lower paid employees whose salaries were fixed along about 1854 that have never been changed. They get $50, $55, $60, $65, and $70 a month, and I think they are entitled to first consideration by Congress. I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that it is not the proper thing for the chief of any bureau or the head of any one of our departments here or elsewhere to take a sum of money equal to $45,000 and give first consideration to those who are getting a living wage, and that first consideration ought to be given to those, especially to-day, who are getting the very lowest pay in the Government service. Take the situation down here in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The lady from Montana, who offers this amendment, has given consideration to the welfare of the girls in that establishment. Some time ago, or some months ago rather, shortly after we entered into the war, they were working the girls 12 hours a day 7 days in the week for a considerable portion of time.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. LONDON. What is the nature of the work these girls do?

Mr. NOLAN. Some act as assistants to plate printers, some are in the stamp room, some are in the counting room, some are in the numbering room; their work is diversified, and most of it is very, very arduous. These assistants to plate printers have the hardest work done by the women in the bureau.

Mr. ROSE. And you may say it is constant.

Mr. NOLAN. It is constant, and they were working 12 hours a day, seven days a week, and there was considerable agitation against this system, and I do not know how it eventually worked out. I know it was changed. As far as the hours are concerned the women down there are getting better treatment, due largely to the activities of the lady from Montana who has introduced this amendment. She has been trying to cure the evils that they have suffered and to enable them to make a decent living. Anybody who knows the situation in the District of Columbia, and most of us who are in constant touch with them will know those who have dependents upon them, and I understand that 80 per cent of the women employees in the bureau there have dependents upon them—with that situation $2.50 a day or $2.70 a day will not take care of them. It would be $16.20 a week, working every day in the week, and $16.20, counting the $120 increase, if they work every day in the year they would get $860; at that rate you can not go very far in Washington, and I think they are entitled to all the consideration that Congress can give them. These are the class of employees to whom we ought to give consideration. Now, a situation has developed here, I do not know whether it will spread to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or not, but somewhere near 1,000 District employees—and you will understand the organization they affiliated with only represents about one-fourth of the men who went out on strike, is not affiliated with the labor movement, and this condition has sprung up in the last few months since Congress provided for $120 per annum increase, and those men had become dissatisfied and want to leave the Government service and enter into other employment that would pay more money, and the result was within a week about a thousand employees went out on strike on two different occasions. I do not approve of that method; I think there ought to be some other way, especially now, for Government employees and other employees to have their grievances adjudicated, but there is a condition among the underpaid employees that prompts them to act collectively so that their grievances regarding wages and living conditions will be brought sharply to the attention of their employer, in this instance the Congress of the United States. If you do not provide the funds necessary to pay these men and women a living wage, they will leave your service and go to some employer that will, and there is plenty of opportunity for them, and as labor gets scarcer, due to the war, your problem will become more serious.

The girls and women that work in the bureau for small wages ought to have first consideration, and they ought to have immediate consideration. I do not think that $2.70 a day is enough or that $3 a day is enough. You ought to place sufficient funds at the disposal of the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the Treasury Department to give them a living wage. Nobody can live in the District of Columbia, I do not care what their color or sex is, unless you give them $3 a day or more. That is the situation that you have confronting you. I do not blame the Committee on Appropriations for this situation. It was brought to them. They stated their position, if I got it right, in the public press, that they appropriated the money that was asked for and estimated for by the Treasury Department, and as a result of that additional money was asked for. Now, the question you have to determine is as to whether the $100,000 that they have allowed is sufficient to give these men and women down there a living wage. I do not think it is. I think the Appropriations Committee should have been more liberal, and I think the amendment offered by the lady from Montana ought to prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a number of telegrams and letters from members and officials of commercial clubs in Nebraska that have been provoked by a speech made by one Capt. W. H. Stayton, supposed to be representing the Navy League, protesting against the passage of a rider to the Navy appropriation bill to prevent the use of the stop-watch system in Government yards and shops. I have prepared an answer to my petitioners, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as I am sure the facts collected on the subject are of widespread interest to the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, these are trying days for men who are responsible as legislators in connection with appropriations and whose hearts are open to the appeal of those who desire to better their condition and secure increased compensation. In that category I embrace all of those who serve on appropriation committees in the House. We all appreciate the fact of the very considerable increase in the cost of living in the last few years. We all appreciate the fact that there are very few people working for wages or ordinary salaries who believe they are securing sufficient compensation above their compensation of past years to cover the increased cost of living. I think it probable that nine-tenths of the employees of the Government may truthfully say that their increased compensation in the past few years has not kept pace with the increased cost of living.

As a matter of fact, there are many educated and able people working for the Government in this city and elsewhere, people who have spent years in preparing themselves for their duties and who have perfected themselves in the performance of those duties by years of earnest effort, that are receiving little or no more compensation now than they did 10 years ago, with the exception of the small stipend of $120 a year which we give to all of those who do not receive compensation in excess of $2,500 a year.

Every time an appropriation bill is considered which provides for the pay of governmental employees we receive appeals for increased compensation. Personally I have frequently regretted that we could not, in view of our sense of responsibility, give all that anyone asked or desired. That is the natural disposition of any kindly disposed man, and I have never met a Member of Congress who was not kindly disposed.

Our natural disposition is to grant them more generous increases, but we have a responsibility, and a very great one, each and every one of us. We are not appropriating our money; we are appropriating the money of the American people, a great majority of whom are hard-working, rather poorly compensated folks. It is costing us a great deal of money to run this Government in this time of war, and a very large number of the best of our people are receiving but $30 a month and keep, throwing their lives in the balance. That fact, however, does not modify our duty in doing justice to those who are employed by the Government in clerical and industrial capacities.

It has been the desire of the committee having charge of this bill, so far as we have any authority—and with regard to many of these employments, many of these compensations, we have no authority whatever—so far as we have any authority and have any control, to do all we can in justice to all of the employees of the Government, in justice to the taxpayers, in making such provisions as will at least reasonably compensate Government employees.

Now, how about these particular employees to whom we have referred? Let us remember that the low-paid employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing do not include all the women employees by any manner of means. Many of them receive a wage very considerably in excess of that which has been referred to. It is only those who are doing the work that any healthy, reasonably capable young woman can do without special training who are receiving the salaries and wages that have been referred to.

The work of the plate printers' assistants and the work of the other employees who have been getting from $1.75 to $1.92 and an additional 10 per cent for an eight-hour day is not work that requires a very considerable amount of training. The work is performed by young women in the main, quite a considerable number of them colored young women, who have been engaged in domestic work but have recently gone into the bureau because there has been an increased demand there and some increase in the pay.

Now, I yield to the lady from Montana.

Miss RANKIN. Have you any idea what proportion of these women receive over $2.24 a day? When I was there, there were over 2,000 women who were receiving that amount or less, and there were not over 500 women who were receiving more—I do not recall the exact number—who were heads of departments and who were receiving more. As I remember, no woman except the head of a department was receiving more than $700 a year.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know accurately, but my recollection is that a considerably larger number of the women than that suggested are receiving a higher pay than that named.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Let me give the gentleman the figures. There are 1,652 that receive $1.92 a day, and others receive more than that.

Mr. MONDELL. But those we are now referring to are women receiving formerly $1.75, and then $1.75 and 10 per cent, and later $1.92 and 10 per cent.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is the gentleman aware that colored girls or colored women—he has just referred to that class—can go out and by performing housework by the day here in the city receive $2 a day, with street car fare and two meals?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true, but, nevertheless, many of them have applied for this work and a considerable number of them have been employed.

The committee has increased this appropriation so that the wages of those employees can be increased to at least $2.24 a day of eight hours.

They can be increased above that sum, because there is no limitation in this bill or in the law; but they can be increased at least that amount with the appropriation that has been granted, and in addition to that they receive about 45 cents a day out of the $120 a year additional pay; so that these employees, whose duties are such as can be performed, as I said a moment ago, by any healthy young person without special training, will receive at least $2.65 to $2.70 a day. These employees are also paid for holidays and have 30 days' leave per annum with pay. When you figure their pay on the basis of the days they actually work it amounts to over $3 per day of eight hours. We have granted a sum which will allow these increases; if you are to increase above that amount the wages of these employees, the employees of these classes, then you must in justice go right through the bill and all other bills and boost largely all along the line, because there are men in the employ of the Government with families who are receiving but very little more, who have been in the employ of the Government for a long time, and whose services are of a more or less skilled, technical, or professional character. The opinion of the committee was that we had granted a sufficient amount of money to bring the wages of these particular employees rather higher than those of employees of the Government generally, when you take into consideration the character of the work performed and the amount of preparation necessary for one to become proficient in it. We have granted a hundred-thousand-dollar increase in this appropriation in order to make possible the increase of the pay of these employees in at least the sums mentioned. It was as much as we felt justified in doing. Of course, if the House sees fit to increase the appropriation further, the Director of the Bureau can then make a larger increase than we had in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the lady from Montana.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Miss RANKIN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 20.

Miss RANKIN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are requested. As many as favor taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Seventeen Members have risen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. NOLAN. The other side, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The other side is requested. It takes 20 to order tellers, a fifth of a quorum.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, the point of no quorum is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. It is true, the point of no quorum is made.

Mr. CARLIN. Unless that is withdrawn, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is out of order. We can not transact any business unless it appears that a quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is always in order. It does not require a quorum to rise.

Mr. CARLIN. The Chair does not understand my point. While a point of no quorum is pending, a motion to rise is not in order. That must be disposed of before the motion to rise is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that it is always in order to entertain the motion to rise. The question is on agreeing to the motion to rise.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Miss RANKIN and Mr. SHERLEY to act as tellers.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The question is on the motion to rise?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the question is on the motion to rise.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 7, noes 39.

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum has been made.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. In case a quorum is obtained, will Members answering the roll vote on the proposition, or will it simply mean a loss of time in calling the roll?

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] insist upon his point of no quorum?

Mr. NOLAN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, H. R. 12441, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 253 Members, a quorum, answered to their names; and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. When the committee was dividing, it was upon the request for tellers. It found itself without a quorum. My inquiry is, Is not the question now before the committee as to whether tellers shall be ordered upon the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The situation is this: The committee divided upon the amendment proposed by the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN]. Under that division the Chair announced that the ayes were 19 and the noes 20. At that point the lady from Montana demanded tellers. The Chair put the question, when 17 Members arose, and the Chair stated that that was not a sufficient number. Whereupon the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] made the point of no quorum. Thereupon the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] moved that the committee rise. The committee refused to rise. The parliamentary situation is that the ayes are 19 and the noes are 20.

Mr. CARLIN. I demand tellers.

Mr. SHERLEY. I insist that tellers have already been refused by the committee and that it is not in order to demand tellers again.

Mr. NOLAN. If it is not in order to demand tellers, it is in order to ask for a vote.

Mr. SHERLEY. I insist that a decision has been had.

Mr. NOLAN. I insist that no decision has been had.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the ayes were 19 and the noes were 20. The Chair had not stated that the noes had it. The Chair thinks that clearly, a quorum not being present at the time——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the Chair will permit, the Chair made the announcement, and the demand was made for tellers. Now, if anybody at that point, with the demand for tellers pending, had made the point of no quorum, it would be in order for the demand for tellers to be submitted to the committee at this time; but instead of that being done, the demand for tellers was put by the Chair, and the committee refused tellers. It did not take a quorum to grant tellers. It took 20 Members. There were more than 20 Members present. The committee refused tellers, and the matter became a closed incident. I have no desire to take advantage of anybody or of the House. The same matter can be arrived at by an amendment being offered, either by the lady from Montana or by anyone else, changing the amount one dollar or half a dollar, or any other amount. Then there will be an opportunity for such statement of the case as will enable those who have come in to vote with knowledge.

Mr. NOLAN. I have no desire to press the point, Mr. Chairman, as I understand another amendment is to be offered.

Mr. CARLIN. I made the demand for tellers.

Mr. NOLAN. I made the point of no quorum.

Mr. CARLIN. I understand; but that has been disposed of. The question before the committee now——

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman, both as a matter of convenience and of information, that the way to reach the question is to offer an amendment substantially the same as the other. There can then be such debate as will enable those present to understand the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for tellers?

Mr. CARLIN. I will, with the understanding that the Chair will recognize the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] to offer an additional amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for tellers?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment proposed by the lady from Montana is rejected.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The lady from Montana offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Miss RANKIN: Page 19, line 8, after the word "assistants," strike out "$1,731,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,981,600."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the lady from Montana.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has to do with the wages of the girls and some men working in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. I have been very much interested in this bureau for over a year, having investigated the conditions there very thoroughly, and having brought the facts of the overwork and underpay and the bad conditions in the bureau to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury. It resulted in all the employees having their hours reduced to eight hours a day. The wages have not been increased, and this has been the first opportunity that Congress has had to increase the wages of these women. This is a very important department of the Government, and there is a very serious situation facing the Government to-day unless something is done to improve conditions in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

As you all know, the bureau was the only place where the District of Columbia girls could work. These girls had no Representative in Congress, and their wages remained very low. The girls assisting the plate printers working at machines have no time to loiter or waste, for they are working with men who do piecework, who therefore work as hard as they can, yet received only $1.75 a day until a very short time ago, when it was raised to $1.92 a day.

The women who are working in other departments of the bureau where it takes a great deal of skill and a great deal of endurance, as, for instance, in the department where they examine the bills, the numbering division, where they read the numbers of bills, they begin in the morning and all day long they count every piece of paper that passes through their hands. They have to examine every bill and see that there is no flaw; they have to read the true numbers on the bill.

When I made the investigation I found that these women had been working overtime for many months. Mr. Ralph told me that he was willing to reduce 400 girls from 13 hours a day to 12 hours a day, and that he was going to continue to work 400 women on night shifts in 12-hour shifts. He was going to reduce 18 women from 15 to 14 hours a day. During this time Mr. Ralph would not allow the women to have transfers to other departments. As a result they had to work in the bureau or go without a job for a year. Since then Mr. McAdoo has insisted that they be given the right to transfer. A great many of the girls have been transferred. When they were put on an eight-hour-a-day shift it necessitated the hiring of a great many more women. These women came in without experience and they have not been doing the grade of work that the women employed in the past had done. I believe that an effort was made by Mr. Ralph, the director who resigned rather than to face the charges against him—that he was doing all in his power to demoralize the bureau in order to prove that the eight-hour shift was not the best plan of work.

As it is now, the girls are leaving the bureau in order to get higher pay, and unless we raise the pay of the employees of the bureau the work will be seriously affected. So it is not altogether for the girls that it is necessary that we should increase the pay. The question of production is involved.

The work that these girls do is really skilled work, although not so called. Yet all those who are not heads of departments are receiving only $2.24 a day. With the horizontal raise for all Government employees it will increase their wages 40 cents a day. But that is not enough of a raise for women doing such technical work under such a physical strain. We find many cases of nervous breakdown. There are several cases in St. Elizabeth from overwork. The women in the numbering division have to have their eyes examined because of eye strain, and yet these girls are receiving only $700 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the Member from Montana has expired.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Miss RANKIN. This increase I am asking for is not for the assistants of the plate printers, but for women working in other departments of the bureau. As you know, this appropriation is a lump sum, and we will have to trust to the director to divide the money among the employees in an equitable manner. That can not be done by legislation by this body. I am asking only for a $250,000 increase over what the committee made, which, I believe, is an increase of $100,000. This will not all go toward increased wages, but, no doubt, a large part will be used for additional employees. New women can not be obtained unless they are offered a reasonable wage. There are many women still working in this department of the bureau receiving only $1.92 a day. Now, we know that is not what the women in the bureau should receive. There may be some departments of the Government where the employees do not work very hard, but no one can say that about the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, for there they are forced to work at a pace set by machines, and then those who do the continual counting from morning until night, constantly counting large sums of money, are given set tasks to perform. This work requires women of capacity and moral courage. If this Congress wishes the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to continue the splendid output they have been making, we must recognize the necessities of the workers.

People can work under a stress in time of peace which, in many instances, can not be endured in time of war. We know that the work of this department is very important. If the new director is not performing his work in the way that it should be performed, we should change the director again; but that the director is not doing his duty is no reason for Congress to continue making appropriations that will necessitate underpay for the women. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the question is not whether we should increase the compensation of the women employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but whether or not the increase provided in this bill is a sufficient increase in the compensation they are now receiving. Deplorable as may have been the conditions existing under Mr. Ralph while he was director of the bureau, he is no longer the director, and certainly it has no relevancy to this question. To-day the women operatives there are working only eight hours a day, and instead of receiving $1.75 a day, they have received all this year, the employees who are the lowest-paid employees in the bureau, $1.75 plus 10 per cent increase, which you provided they should be paid. About three weeks ago the director increased the compensation of the lowest-paid employees from $1.75 to $1.92 a day. So that to-day they are receiving $1.92 plus the 10 per cent increase. They work eight hours, they are allowed time and a half overtime, they are allowed 30 days leave with pay, and all holidays, in addition to the half holidays, which, during the summer, we know they are allowed on Saturdays. The operatives who receive $1.92 number 1,652. Of the 1,652 there are 1,353 not included in this appropriation, the plate printers' assistants, who are included in an appropriation that is on the next page of the bill. The employees who are paid $1.92 a day, instead of being engaged in counting money, as the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] states, are the plate printers' assistants, and outside of these employees there are, according to the director of the bureau, only 299 women employees receiving $1.92 per day.

The only work comparable in any way with the work done by the plate-printers' assistants is the work done by the employees of the Government Printing Office who feed the presses, and who receive $2.20 per day. On that statement the committee acted and we have provided the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing with $100,000. That $100,000 was to allow him to make the compensation of the women who now receive $1.92, plus 10 per cent—$2.25 per day—so that they will receive 5 cents more per day than will the employees of the Government Printing Office who do work which, according to the director, demands more skill. In addition to the $2.25 per day, the legislative bill carries $120 per year, which amounts to about 45 cents additional compensation, increasing the compensation of these employees who received $1.75 a month ago, from $1.75 to $2.70 a day, which you will be granting by adopting the provisions of this bill. When you have granted that you will be paying them more than you pay the Government Printing Office employees who are engaged in similar work, and if you increase this compensation as is desired by the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] you will have to increase the salary of every employee whose compensation is provided for in this bill, and you may as well ask the Committee on Ways and Means to stay in session long enough to tax the people to death. There is no reason why we should lose our heads and let our sympathies supplant our judgment when we have provided an increase from $1.75 a day to $2.70 a day at this session of Congress.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman, of course, knows that the women in the Government Printing Office are also seeking an increase, does he not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not.

Mr. DYER. I will say that they are, and what would the pay be for these women if the amendment offered by the lady from Montana should carry?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have no idea.

Mr. DYER. At any rate, it would not be over $3 a day.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I could not tell you, but I judge from the appropriation that it would be more than $3 a day. If you adopt the report of the committee, you will be paying them $2.70 a day.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman think that is too much for a woman who gives all of her time to the Government in these days, when they are bringing women from all over the United States——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Oh, they are bringing them here, not to do this kind of work but to do the work of skilled workmen, and there are over 1,300 women in the bureau who are getting $2.24, and 1,156 who are getting more than $2.24 a day, ranging up to $2.82 a day. Some are getting $2.69, some $2.62, some $2.56, some $2.50, some $2.31, and you are going to add to their pay an increase of $120 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have no desire to have more time.

Mr. DYER. I ask that the gentleman may have two minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask that my time be extended two minutes in order to answer a question of the gentleman from Kentucky, who was on his feet first.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the gentleman how the wages of these employees in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing compare with the wages of employees in other departments of the Government doing similar work?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The only employees in the Government engaged in work in any way similar to the work of these employees are the employees of the Government Printing Office. If you adopt the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, you will be paying these employees a little more than you are paying the employees of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it not a fact these people have about the hardest work to do of any employees in the Government service?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am satisfied they have not, and I am satisfied if the gentleman takes the trouble to read the statement of the director of the bureau he will become convinced that that is not correct.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, how do they compare with the wages received in the Agricultural Department, for instance?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It depends upon what they are doing entirely. Stenographers are paid one wage, clerks are paid another, scientists are paid another wage, and Members of Congress are paid another wage.

Mr. THOMAS. The employees of the Agricultural Department, for instance, receive all the way from $900 to $2,000 per year. Is not the work of this Bureau of Engraving and Printing much harder work than it is in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. On the contrary, so far as the work of plate printers' assistants is concerned, it is constant work but requires no skill at all. It is simply handing the paper to the plate printer. These people are not engaged in counting money. The women who perform that duty are paid more money, but the lowest-paid employee, who receives $1.92 plus 10 per cent, is not a skilled laborer.

Mr. THOMAS. Do not they trim these bills?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The people who receive $1.92 are not the ones who perform that duty at all.

Mr. THOMAS. What are they paid?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The other women employed are paid all the way from $2.24 to $2.88. Those receiving $2.88, together with the 10 per cent, are getting more than $3 per day, and you are going to add $120 a year——

Mr. THOMAS. Does that equal the pay in these other departments?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I could not answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina quoting his figures is not entirely accurate. The statement made is that these employees would have their wages raised from $1.75 a day to $2.70 per day if the amount provided in this bill remains undisturbed. The fact of the matter is, under the amendment to the appropriation bill a year ago the wages of employees were raised from $1.75 to $1.92½ a day; that is the 10 per cent provided for the present fiscal year. If all that the gentleman states is correct, the amount now recommended would only bring the pay from $1.92½ to $2.70, but I can not for the life of me find out how these gentlemen can figure where these employees are going to be raised to $2.24 a day on the $100,000 allowed in this item. According to the statement of the gentleman himself, there are thirteen hundred and some odd employees who will participate in this $100,000 per year, and I would like to find out how 1,300 employees working 300 days per year can have their wages raised in the amount these gentlemen state out of the additional appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman did not listen to what I said. I called attention to the fact that the plate printers' assistants, 1,300 or more, are not included in this item, but in another item.

Mr. NOLAN. Take the other 1,700 who are working there for $1.75 a day——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. But they are not in this item.

Mr. NOLAN. But there are either 1,700 or there are 1,300 provided for in this item, because there are over 3,000 employees at the bureau and are provided for in this paragraph and one other, and the gentleman must make his figures fit either case. I would like to know where you did get your figures.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. From the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken in his assumption that all the people are only getting $1.92.

In point of fact, in this group there is only a certain portion that are getting $1.92 a day, and quite a number of others are getting very much more than that.

Mr. NOLAN. How does the gentleman figure that in one year's time, counting 300 days a year, you can spread $100,000 over the number of the employees that must get the benefit of this provision?

Mr. SHERLEY. I answer the gentleman by saying this: We made a very careful calculation of the amount of money that is necessary in order to see to it that nobody was required to work for less than $2.24 a day, excluding, now, the $120 that they will get. If the gentleman can mathematically say that we have not provided that amount or an amount sufficient for that, I will agree now to accept any amendment necessary to so supply it. And I state to him that, as the result of the calculation made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and myself and the clerk of the committee, these figures were arrived at so as to guarantee a minimum of $2.24 to every employee working in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman from South Carolina is no more correct in these figures than he was in his statement that these employees were getting raised from $1.75 to $2.70, then he is not correct at all. A short time ago I called attention to the fact that some 1,600 employees in the District of Columbia struck because they did not get enough money to keep body and soul together. Now, these employees in the District of Columbia, in the street sweeping department and other departments, are employed for $1.50 or $1.75, plus 10 per cent. Those employees are not members of any labor organization affiliated with the labor movement.

I understand that out of the thousand that struck only two or three hundred are affiliated with any organization. I called your attention to the deplorable condition that is existing here among the underpaid employees, and the small wages these men received caused the strike. I do not blame the Appropriations Committee for this condition, but somebody must assume responsibility for it, and it is now up to Congress to say whether you will provide the money now. The question is whether you are going to provide enough money to give people a living wage. The wages were fixed in 1854 for most of the underpaid employees of the Government service, and they have never been raised since, except as Congress raised them 10 per cent last year and provided the $120 flat increase for the coming year. If you want people to work for you, you must pay them as much as other people are paying them. You can take up the Star or the Times or the Post and you can find all kinds of employees being advertised for at 40 and 50 cents an hour for common labor. These employees are skilled workers, some of whom have worked for the Government many years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NOLAN. How can we expect people to rest contented in their employment, how can we expect even the unskilled workers for the Government of the United States to rest contented in their employment, and not leave us, unless we treat them as private employers do? Women in the Government service here in the District of Columbia ought to have a living wage. I do not think that $2.70 a day is enough for a single woman, let alone a woman with dependents.

And, according to the testimony of the investigators who have investigated conditions at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, 80 per cent of the women down there have those that are dependent upon them. They ought to get more than $2.70 a day. They ought to get $3 a day; and they ought to get more than that. They ought to get at least enough to provide them with the necessaries of life under present living conditions. The Congress of the United States regulates the wages of these people through their appropriations. You ought to see that the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the Secretary of the Treasury have power enough—and the only way they will have power enough is to receive sufficient money—to give these people a living wage. We ought to be at least as generous with the low-paid employees as we have with the others. We ought to give them in proportion as we give to those who are getting $2,000 to $2,500 a year. We ought to give them a chance to live, and the only way we can give them a chance to live is to give them a living wage, and the only way they can get that is to increase these appropriations. I do not think the Committee on Appropriations had the time or opportunity—they have only had this matter before them for a few days—to properly investigate the situation. I do not think they have had the time to give it the study they ought to give it. They ought to look upon it from a different standpoint, and not from that which the Ways and Means Committee is called upon to face. They ought to look upon the human element involved and give these people a living wage.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DALLINGER. What is the question before the House now?

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the House is the amendment proposed by the lady from Montana.

Mr. DALLINGER. Have tellers been demanded?

The CHAIRMAN. Not for this.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I was not upon the subcommittee that prepared this bill, but basing my statement upon former recollection of the time when I helped to frame the sundry civil bill and upon a little inquiry I have made and a glance at the hearings, this is the situation: These employees, working eight hours a day, have 30 days' leave of absence with full pay, amounting to $120. Now, with the pay that they are at present receiving and the increase they are now receiving, and with this increase they will get $3.10 a day.

A MEMBER. Oh, no!

Mr. CANNON. A gentleman says "Oh, no." Does he speak knowingly? I say yes; because I have just inquired concerning it of one of the members of the committee who helped prepare this bill. These employees receive $3.10 for working days.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Do you count in that 30 days' leave?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not a fact that for the 30 days they have out they are not able to receive compensation; and does that in any way increase the pay?

Mr. CANNON. They receive compensation for 30 days' leave of absence. It is $120 a year. Does the gentleman know that with this $3.10 a day the employees who are performing unskilled labor are receiving better pay than similar employees receive in the Government Printing Office? Does the gentleman know that his laboring people and my laboring people, who are getting less wages, have to help pay these wages?

Gentlemen, let us not go off on the point of sentiment. Let us pay all of the employees of the Government all that they ought to receive. Of course, it sounds ungracious to oppose an amendment offered by the lady Member from Montana, and it sounds ungracious to say that these girls or women are working for these wages. But, after all, one half of the population of the United States of 110,000,000 are of the feminine gender and the other half are of the male gender, and in the grand round-up the people pay the bill. It seems to me that the committee ought to be sustained. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the lady from Montana.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Miss RANKIN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wages of plate printers, at piece rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the rates usually paid for such work, including the wages of printers' assistants, when employed, $1,930,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no portion of this sum shall be expended for printing United States notes or Treasury notes of larger denominations than those that may be canceled or retired, except in so far as such printing may be necessary in executing the requirements of the act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes, approved March 14, 1900.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The lady from Montana offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Miss RANKIN: Page 20, line 7, add the following at the end of the line: "Provided also, That no part of this sum shall be used to increase the wages of plate printers until all printers' assistants receive not less than $2.24 a day."

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made on the floor of the House that the director of the bureau has used the money provided for increase in wages by increasing the salaries of those already receiving high wages, and this amendment merely provides that he must pay the printers' assistants not less than $2.24 a day before he increases the wages of the plate printers.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment read again, and if it contains no more than the lady indicates, I have no objection to it. I think it is high time that instead of increasing highly paid people you should increase the lower paid first. But I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the lady from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read to and including page 21, line 1.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SHERLEY and Mr. MONDELL were given leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, H. R. 12441, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LITTLEPAGE for four days, on account of important business.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 684).

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report filed yesterday on the war-risk insurance bill and amendments to it, Senate bill 4482, be withdrawn, because an error has been discovered in the number of one of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks leave to withdraw the conference report on the war-risk insurance bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LONDON was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 13, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the House has passed the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes. There are only four amendments by the House to the bill. I have consulted with the members of the Committee on Education and Labor and none of us consider the amendments to be so material that we feel called upon to object to them. First——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. We are acting under a unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are; and if there is objection——

Mr. GALLINGER. We ought to proceed under that agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the statement of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are acting under a unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator is out of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the unanimous-consent agreement exclude calling up——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It certainly does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had not read the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have not been able to hear all the arguments which have been made for and against the proposed rule now under consideration. I have, however, talked with some of its proponents for the purpose of trying to determine the real objects sought to be obtained through its passage.

The author of this particular amendment stated to me that he had three objects in view. One was to prevent as far as possible interruptions which would interfere with the continuity of a Senator's address; another was to exclude extraneous matter from debate, and a third was to satisfy public opinion, which, he stated, had already condemned unlimited debate in the United States Senate.

I heard another Senator state that there was a fourth object, and that was to make it possible to devote more time to measures which were passed over hurriedly and which are now, in fact, being disposed of without debate or consideration. I have reflected on those reasons and I can find no substance in any one of them which appeals to my judgment.

The first argument, namely, that this rule will tend to discourage interruptions, is certainly without any basis of reason. Under the existing rule any Senator has complete charge of the question as to whether he will be interrupted or not. It is only by his consent that he can be interrupted. He yields to his colleague by courtesy. There is nothing in the proposed rule that will prevent his yielding to another even as he yields now. The only difference is that the new rule will permit an hour and a half in which to make interruptions instead of unlimited time.

There is another rule also in existence which prohibits any Senator from speaking more than twice on the same subject within the day, and any Senator can enforce that rule. If expedition is the object of the rule, why do not those Senators who desire it exercise their present right?

The second object that is advanced by the proponents of the measure is that it will tend to exclude extraneous matter and confine the debate to the subject under consideration. There is no force in that. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] a day or two ago took occasion to address the Senate on a subject that was entirely foreign and entirely new except to him, and on which he seems to have a copyright, namely, an argument against the right of the Supreme Court to pass on the constitutionality of a legislative act. That had nothing to do with this resolution, yet the Senator spoke for an hour or more on it. He could speak an hour and a half on that same subject to-morrow if this rule were adopted. There is nothing in the proposition which compels the speaker to confine himself to the subject before the Senate. The fact is there are only a few Senators who, on any bill, ever occupy more than an hour and a half; and yet it frequently happens that a Senator who desires to discuss any question foreign to the matter under consideration gets the floor and puts in his speech; and he can still do that after the rules are amended as proposed.

The third object which the Senator talking with me dwelt upon most earnestly was that public sentiment demanded that the rules of the Senate should be amended. Who knows that? Who has a right to speak for public sentiment on this subject? I know, as you do, that men who favor a bill want to close debate if they think they have the votes to pass it. When some Senators have made their speeches on some particular subject they are ready to go to a vote, and very frequently they call for a vote.

Public sentiment, as I understand it, demands that necessary legislation shall be properly enacted. The public believe in full, open discussion—that is, that there shall be given publicity to whatever is proposed or is done in the Senate. Propagandists who have lobbied for some cause and who believe they have sufficient votes condemn further debate, but this does not mean that the people desire no information on the other side.

Never in the history of our country has there been more need of publicity than there is at the present time. The Senate and the White House are the only places in the United States where there is free and untrammeled opportunity for open discussion. It will be a sad day for our Republic when the Senate ceases to be a free and open forum. The Senate has fallen into the habit of permitting bills to be prepared for it outside. Many of the committees having charge of such measures do nothing more than O. K. the action that is proposed outside of the Chamber. Do the people complain because when the bills come upon the floor Senators who are charged with the responsibility of passing upon them insist upon reading them and then upon giving reasons for or against them, in order that the country may know what is being done? Properly informed public sentiment does not condemn the Senate for due and all-sufficient deliberation. It may at times become impatient with the lack of terminals of a few Senators, but it knows that this body is expected to disclose the reasons for legislation.

I have tried to find what the real object of this resolution is. Certainly the reasons that have been advanced for it are not sufficient ones, because it is clear that its adoption would not relieve the conditions of which complaint is made. If every Senator on this floor occupied an hour and one-half in discussion when a bill is under consideration, more time would be consumed than is taken under the present rule, and there would be a temptation for more Senators to speak if long-distance speakers were denied the right of unlimited discussion. No; this proposition would not expedite legislation. It would have a tendency to degrade and belittle debate, and the spectacle of the Senate of the United States operating under a stop watch would be most humiliating and undignified.

I have been content to listen in silence to arguments of other Senators who have presented the reasons that I would myself have given if I had taken the floor, but if it shall so happen that those Senators who love debate, and adorn it very frequently, shall fail to present the reasons that appeal to me, I shall feel it my duty to present them myself. I believe, as I have said, that under this proposed rule expedition will not occur, but I think I know that the result, whether such is the object or not, will be to stifle legitimate debate in this body. I do not know whether this is calculated as the beginning of an attack upon the open forum, upon free and full consideration or not, but I am very apprehensive of direful results to future legislation which will follow the proposed action.

When I was a Member of the other House I became very active in an effort to liberalize the rules of the House, so that there could be some discussion, and that it should not be confined to the members of a close corporation. There is no opportunity for real debate there, except by a favored few, though now and then a Representative gets permission to print his speech in the RECORD. I realize, of course, that in a body of 435 members some limitations on debate are necessary; but those reasons do not exist in the Senate. More than 100 years of legislative experience have developed no demand for cloture here. The House Members understand that real unfettered discussion will occur only in the Senate.

Any Senator now can rise in his place and call to order and take from the floor a Senator who interrupts another for any purpose other than for asking a question. That right is now in existence under the rules. But your experience, Senators, and mine, has been that the most illuminating debates in the Senate, the best information frequently which has been obtained, has come from running debate. Points are thereby brought out which otherwise would have been overlooked or neglected.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I have waited in vain for some Senator to tell the Senate and the country when, if at any time since the United States entered the present war, there has been because of useless debate any delay in the proper consideration and action upon any necessary measure.

I was surprised yesterday to hear the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] say he had discovered a filibuster here in the Senate. I was surprised because I had not heard and I did not believe that any such thing existed or had been attempted. In thinking it over I concluded that the only thing that could have been properly charged to a filibuster was the course pursued by the Senator from Oklahoma himself, because in the midst of the discussion of this measure, which he wanted adopted so much, he arose and for more than an hour discussed a measure that was not at all relevant to the discussion before the Senate. No other attempt or no other speech that could be considered as an attempt to filibuster on this resolution has been made.

The Senate to the last Senator in it is anxious to expedite necessary legislation, but every Senator here realizes that we are dealing with stupendous problems, such problems as we have never before had, and which will reach far into the future, and upon whose solution will depend the weal or woe of our country, aye of the world. The questions will not be simply those involving State rights or national rights but of world rights. Shall we shackle the Senate so as to lessen its ability or weaken its powers?

I submit, Mr. President, we would be derelict in our duty if we did not consider all matters entitled to legislative consideration from every angle and present all the reasons for and against them. In theory, at least, every Senator is the equal of every other. He is positively so so far as voting is concerned, and surely no other Senator has a right to condemn his efforts at service to his State as unworthy of consideration.

I have not unduly occupied the time of the Senate in discussion since I have been here, and sometimes I have been wearied by the multiplied speeches of others; but I have not reached the point of the Senator from Oklahoma, where I have made up my mind unalterably on a measure before I come into the Senate and am willing to vote without an opportunity of hearing its other side. I am willing to listen to my colleagues, and when I am speaking I will invoke the rules of the Senate that prevent an interruption which is not pertinent to the subject matter under discussion if I do not wish to be interrupted. I have the power to control that now, and I would have to exercise it under this rule.

Mr. President, what the Senate needs is not a cloture rule, which, even if effective, would permit it to jamb legislation through the congressional machine and thus make it possible for its Members to go home and engage in personal politics, but more attention by Senators to the real arguments pro and con and pending matters of legislation. Not cloture but intelligent deliberation is the present need.

This is an insidious attempt, as it seems to me, to limit debate and confine it according to the wishes of people not connected directly with the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will my colleague permit an interruption?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to remind my colleague—and he knows the fact as well as I do—that about three-fifths of all the legislation that takes place in this Chamber is under a self-imposed cloture of unanimous consent. All of us consent voluntarily to a cloture on nearly two-thirds of all the business we transact.

Mr. GALLINGER. As we did last evening in connection with this very resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We did that last evening, and we are now operating under it this morning, every Senator having agreed to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My colleague is quite correct.

Mr. President, since I have been a Member of the Senate I have never seen, except during the last days of a Congress, any bill defeated, by a filibuster or otherwise, which a majority of the Senate earnestly desired to pass. It has never been done, and it can not be done. The will of the majority properly determined can always be exercised, not on the minute, not a given hour possibly, but at some time during the session, and it always will be so.

Public sentiment! Senators seem to be fearful of public sentiment. The only sentiment that I have to face is that of my constituents. If I so conduct myself in this body as to overstep the courtesies of debate or prevent proper action upon legislation, I must settle that action with my constituents. I object, Mr. President, to having any Senator or number of Senators place any restriction upon me in the exercise of my duties as a representative from my State.

When I was a Member of the other House, to me one of the attractive features of service in the Senate was that there was an opportunity for debate and full consideration. I did not expect to abuse that privilege, and I never have done so. Yet it is proposed here and now, for some reason not made clear, when everything is working well, when there is no complaint anywhere that the Senate is failing in the performance of its duties, to change this fundamental rule of the Senate, which has been one of its greatest elements of strength during all of its history.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be very brief. I have found that these movements to regulate the Senate, coming unheralded and without apparent reason, always have some concealed foundation. I state it as my own judgment, and I wish to ask the Senator if he does not concur in that view, that the proposed new rule is urged in preparation of the presentation to the Senate of a treaty, which will come possibly sooner than many Senators expect, and it is desired to thrust it upon the Senate and ratify it without discussion other than that allowed under the limitations of the proposed rule. That is my deliberate judgment; and I believe it was in the mind of the Executive when he communicated with some of those who are urging the passage of this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I know nothing about that. I have no suspicion in reference to the matter, although I confess that I have become confused in my efforts to find a reason for it at this time. I dislike to impugn the motives of any Senator. I can not believe that the Senator from Alabama, whom I have known so long and so favorably, could have had any unworthy object in view in presenting the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it is rarely that I ever answer a suggestion of this kind. In my experience in legislative bodies I have usually found that it is unnecessary; but, in view of the suggestion of my life-time friend from Michigan, I can not let the statement go by without making a statement myself.

So far as I know, the President of the United States has had nothing whatever to do with the initiation of this proposed rule in this body. I have always believed in a reasonable cloture rule. In the last Congress I introduced an amendment to the rules to that effect, and I renewed it in this Congress. It was finally submitted to the Committee on Rules, and a subcommittee of three was appointed to consider the question. That subcommittee consisted of myself as chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The original amendment to the rules submitted by me proposed to bring cloture on a vote of the Senate. When the subcommittee met the suggestion came from the Senator from Iowa that he preferred to have a distinct limitation on debate of one hour without the injection of a cloture rule to be ordered by a majority of the Senate. The Senator from Virginia and myself said we would agree with him on that question and adopt it as a substitute, and I prepared the substitute and submitted it to the full committee.

I think that when we agreed on this proposition there was not a man in the Senate or outside of it, except the three men whom I have named, who knew anything about it. I am sure that when it was presented to the full committee it was unknown, except to that committee. There was a majority of the committee present, and the proposed amendment of the rules was reported by a vote of all the Senators present, except one.

Now, so far as the President of the United States is concerned, I have not talked with him about the matter; but I understand from others who have talked with him that he has said that he did not desire to interfere in any way with the business of the Senate or with the way it conducted its business; but that, so far as he was personally concerned, viewing it as an outsider, he was heartily in accord with the proposed rule that had been presented, and would be glad to see it adopted.

As to there being any distinct bill to which the proposed new rule may be applied, or as to any ulterior motive being behind this proposition, there is none whatever, except just what I have said. There may be an ulterior motive on my part, because I do not believe as does my colleague from Michigan. I believe that the expedition of business is of far more value to the Senate than unlimited debate; and there we disagree on a principle.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will, with the permission of the Senator from Michigan, who has the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator from Alabama consider that this rule applies to treaties?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, a treaty would be ratified by a resolution, of course.

Mr. LODGE. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And if a treaty is ratified by a resolution, the rule would apply to a treaty.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I be permitted to ask a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I want to ask—and I am addressing this inquiry more particularly to the Senator from Massachusetts, who happens to be on the floor, than to any other Senator—whether there is not now pending a treaty which may require military service under draft of certain American citizens of the age of 18, and whether the debate upon that treaty and upon the legislation which may be necessary in connection with it would not be limited if this rule is adopted?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It is public knowledge, of course, that such a treaty is pending now and is before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that it would require legislation of a general character now pending in what is known as the alien-slacker bill before the Committee on Military Affairs, and of course the pending rule would apply both to the treaty and to the bill.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator whether it would not also apply to a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly. That is done by resolution.

Mr. REED. Now, I want to know from the Senator who has the floor his opinion of limiting debate to 20 minutes on an amendment which might be introduced to any bill which would provide for military service under draft by boys of 18.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I can conceive of nothing that would be more disastrous to the country, or more unwise on the part of the Senate, than to adopt a provision which would make it possible to do a thing of that kind. I said a moment ago that there were very serious questions, new questions, involving the very life of the country, that are to come up—new questions without any precedent—and yet Senators now advocate the policy of putting restrictions upon fullest and freest public discussion on the part of Senators who are to act upon such matters.

Reverting to what the Senator from Alabama has said—namely, that only three Senators knew about this rule, that there was no demand among the Senators here that such a rule be adopted, that the President himself has not been willing to intervene, and was satisfied for the Senate to do what it pleased—that makes it more difficult for me to understand how it ever occurred to those three Senators to do a thing of this kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator should not overlook the fact that there has been a very considerable demand by many Senators, on the floor and off the floor, for a limitation on debate; and the indications up to this time have pointed to the fact that a majority of the Senate is desirous of accepting this rule. Of course, if a majority of the Senate is not desirous of accepting the rule when the final vote comes, there is nothing left of the Senator's argument.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We have already a rule which limits debate. It was but recently adopted. There has been no demand since this war broke out that I have heard from any source that the rule for unlimited debate should be changed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield, gladly.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of what my good friend, the Senator from Alabama, said about the action of the committee, I want to make this statement concerning my own position:

I am a member of the Committee on Rules, and on several occasions antagonized this proposed change in the rules. A subcommittee was appointed, as the Senator suggests, and on a certain date I received notice that there would be a meeting of the Committee on Rules. I did not know what the purpose of the meeting was. At that time I was engaged with the Committee on Appropriations, considering as a member of a subcommittee an important appropriation bill. For that reason I did not attend the meeting of the committee; and at that meeting this rule was reported out. Had I been present, I think some members of the committee know that I would, with a good deal of earnestness, have opposed the rule and opposed the report; but I did not attend, and of course in a sense I am bound by the action of the committee in so far as reporting out the rule is concerned.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I repeat that I have tried to discover the reason why the committee of three should project this matter upon the Senate at this time. I knew that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was in favor of cloture—that is, of limiting debate. Most new Senators are instinctively for re-forming the rules. I do not imagine that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who is a very active man on other matters, had very much to say about it. I have been trying to find why the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] wanted it at this time. I can imagine that possibly where a Senator has been charged with having prevented by much discussion some legislation, it might be desirable for him to make himself square before his constituents; but it is difficult for me to believe that the Senator from Iowa was inspired by that thought, knowing him as well as I do, and having such confidence in him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, the suggestion just made by the Senator from Michigan was not in my mind at all, because upon that occasion I did not prevent the consideration of the matter in hand. I did not occupy a longer time than I would be permitted to occupy under this rule. In fact, I occupied less time than I would be permitted to occupy under this rule. I have always been in favor of a limitation upon debate, for I agree with the Senator from Alabama in that respect, that while there are times when great good can be accomplished without the limitation which he suggests, I think upon the whole the business of the Senate would be better done and more completely done with a reasonable limitation than without it. It is no new view on my part, because I have always held it, and always expressed it when I had an opportunity, or when it was proper for me to do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am not finding any fault with the Senator's attitude on that former bill when it was before the Senate, when 12 Senators were classified as "the willful twelve." I said at the time, or immediately afterwards, that the criticism was an unjust one. That bill, though defeated, was afterwards acknowledged by the President to be unnecessary to accomplish the very purpose which he sought. He had the power already. But I say I have been trying to find out why this resolution should come up at this time, when this, I repeat, is the only place in the United States where we can have anything like free, uncensored discussion and publicity; and yet with treaties most important and conditions unprecedented following this war to confront us, then these Senators propose to enter a wedge which will separate the power of the Senate from the responsibilities which rest upon it in the crucial times which are upon us and which are to follow.

When there is abuse, there is time enough to act. Every man now in the Senate is willing to cooperate to speed up necessary legislation; it has demonstrated this fact over and over again; but every Senator realizes that he is charged with the responsibility from his constituents to act intelligently for his State, and to disseminate light as far as within him lies, and he is responsible to his constituents alone for what he does. But at this time, when you have been shutting off publicity from every source outside, you propose to tie your hands and seal your lips and sit under a stop watch while you consider as irresponsible children under the restraint of a master the problems prepared by others for your approval.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has called attention to what he characterizes as an unwarranted attack upon the so-called "willful twelve." He has also called attention to a statement of the President that he believed he had the power to arm the merchant ships. Will the Senator allow me to read just one brief sentence from the President's message of April 2, 1917?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection, unless somebody else wants the floor. If there is somebody waiting to speak I do not care to occupy the floor longer.

Mr. GRONNA. It will take just one second. In that message the President states:

> When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is the thing to which I referred.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to conclude, because I understand that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] wishes to speak, and others desire to do so before the general debate is closed at 4 o'clock. I believe that presently this proposition will not expedite business. I have given my reasons for that belief. There has not been a favorable argument presented here on the subject which to my mind is worth considering. The custom of diverting criticism, of interjecting irrelevant matter, is not prevented by this resolution. Perhaps half a dozen Senators in the Senate, taking the session through, occupy as much time as the rest of the Senate put together.

Many of them have debated matters of extreme importance. They have given a great deal of time to the consideration of them. I have generally been content to listen to them, as I said. If they left out anything that I had thought about, I would discuss it myself. But because the statement has gone out to the country that a few Senators occupy a good deal of time, it is proposed by this committee that the whole Senate shall render itself impotent against a time when all Senators might want to discuss a matter which they regarded of vital consequence to the country itself.

Mr. President, I think this measure is a mistake. I regret exceedingly that it was thought necessary to bring it in during these war times, when no Senator has pointed out a single instance of delay caused by unlimited debate—not one. I now challenge any Senator to point such an instance. But, of course, none can be named.

Another thing that occurs to me is this: We have been in the habit of condemning long speeches sometimes, and I confess that at times I have criticized them, too; but I have recalled that subsequent events have shown that many Senators were right in appealing to the Senate to consider the question under discussion, and it was their duty to make those appeals to the Senate if by doing so they had any hope of changing the sentiments of the Senators.

So, Mr. President, feeling as I do that nothing good can be immediately accomplished, and that possibly great harm can be done in the consideration of questions growing out of this war by the adoption of this resolution, I am opposed to it and I trust it will fail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is my only opportunity to make a speech on this question, and so I have taken the floor; but the Senator from Georgia says he wants five minutes, and so I will yield to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, at the opening of the session of the Senate to-day the Vice President said:

> We are acting under a unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator is out of order.

That statement had reference to myself. I think the Chair did not intend that statement. I had made no motion. I was calling attention to a matter that had been acted upon by the House. I had a right to do it. I had a right to proceed to discuss that question upon the floor if I wished. The unanimous-consent agreement in no way affected my right to call attention to such a matter, and I certainly was not out of order. I suppose the Chair meant that if I made a motion to concur in the action of the House I would be out of order. I had not made such a motion. I desire, however, to submit that the unanimous-consent agreement would not have precluded such a motion.

The unanimous-consent agreement reads as follows:

> It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Thursday, June 13, 1918, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the resolution S. Res. 235; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., on said calendar day, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution or any amendment offered thereto.

The rules of the Senate provide that—

> The presiding officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives.

The unanimous-consent agreement did not preclude such a motion. I had not even made such a motion; but while I was simply calling attention to what had been done in the House, I was ruled by the Chair to be out of order.

I simply desire to make this statement and to assert my conviction that I was perfectly in order, and would have been in order if I had proceeded further and moved action upon the House amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sometimes makes a mistake in endeavoring to read the mind of a Senator, but the Chair does not think he was mistaken in his endeavor to read the mind of the Senator from Georgia. What the Senator from Georgia said was that the committee did not think any serious changes in the bill had been made by the House. The Chair assumed that the Senator from Georgia was about to proceed to move to consider the matter; and, on the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire, the Chair expressed the opinion that the resolution in regard to the rules being the unfinished business, with a unanimous-consent agreement, it would take unanimous consent in order to consider any other business while the unanimous-consent agreement was in force and effect. Of course, if that was a wrong ruling of the Chair, it is very easily rectified by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The "Senator from Georgia" has made no motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair perfectly understands that. If the Senator from Georgia will say that he did not intend to make a motion, the Chair will apologize to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The "Senator from Georgia" had not reached that stage of procedure and the Chair has no right to ask the "Senator from Georgia" what he intended to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has no right to think that the Chair was mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. The regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, it has been asked in the debate why this resolution is before the Senate at this time, as if there might be some other time when it could be properly brought before the Senate and should not be pending now. As the proponent of the original resolution to which the pending measure relates I will say that it never occurred to me that there might be a proper time or there might be an improper time for a Senator to propose an amendment to the rules of the Senate if in his judgment they needed amendment. My original proposal for a limitation of debate was presented before we became engaged in this war. Because we have become engaged in the war has not appealed to me as any reason why I should cease my endeavor to secure a cloture rule that I thought was advisable before we entered into the war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the Senator think that the Senate has been expeditious in the handling of war problems?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer that in just a moment. It takes me away from my line of thought and I will be glad to answer it before I get through.

If the Senate has not transacted its business as expeditiously as it might have done, then there is a good reason why we should limit debate so as to expedite our business, but if the procedure of the Senate has been such that an individual Member of the Senate thinks that we have transacted all the business that came before us with that expedition which was needed, he, of course, would occupy a different position from that which I do.

I think the great distinction that Members draw in debate is a question between the right of the Senate, the importance of the Senate as a part of our governmental machinery, and the right and importance of the individual Member of the Senate. This body has been in the past one of the greatest forums in the world. There has probably been no part of the governmental machinery that has had the same effect and has been productive of as great and important results upon the life of the American Nation as the United States Senate has in the past, and I for one do not believe that the usefulness and greatness of this body has passed. But I recognize that, although the Senate as a body occupies the same position before the Nation and in the councils of the Nation that it has for a hundred years, of necessity the Senator who occupies a seat on this floor does not occupy the same relative position that a Senator did in the days that are gone, and he can not expect to do so. If you belong to an organization that has 10 votes, those 10 votes control the situation in that organization and each member of it constitutes one-tenth of the integral part, and each vote carries with it a very much greater degree of force and influence than if you belong to an organization composed of 5,000 members and each member's influence is divided into 5,000 parts. The growth of the Senate, of necessity, has placed the position of the individual Senator in a different light and a different position, so far as his relative influence in this body now that it is composed of 96 Members, than that occupied by a Senator when it was composed of 26 Members. I do not mean to say that in this body there are not great men with great intellectual ability who can rise far above the balance of us and have the power and influence that the greatest of men have had in the past, but I mean taking the average strength and influence of the power of a Senator it of necessity as compared with the power of the body is not as great as it was in the past.

More than that, as I said in the beginning of this debate, the question of limitation of debate in a legislative body is of necessity governed by the membership of the body. A legislative body composed of three men would not even require a presiding officer or rules and no limitation of debate. A legislative body composed of a thousand men, in order that they might do business must have a presiding officer, must have rules of procedure, and must have an absolute cloture in debate in order that the majority may transact the business that is before them.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator will concede that the majority of the Senate are opposed to this resolution——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I will not concede that, because I would not have it before the Senate if I believed it.

Mr. SMOOT. If this part of the resolution were eliminated:

> Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following—

Then follows the proposed rule—I think the Senator will admit that if those words were stricken out of the resolution he could not pass the resolution through the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure of that, by any means.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like the Senator to withdraw the words I have read and allow the Senate to vote upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; because I have no power to withdraw the words. In the original resolution that I introduced there was no limitation.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I understand the Senator——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the committee of which I was a member decided to put a limitation in and I agreed to it, and of course I shall represent the committee, as I reported the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. If those words were not added to the resolution the resolution would never have seen the light of day from that committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a matter of opinion upon the part of the Senator from Utah. I am not sure that the Senator is right about that, but I am not prepared to express a definite opinion, as I did not poll the committee on the subject. Therefore, I will not speak of it. But that is neither here nor there. I am not seriously objecting to this language limiting the life of the rule to the term of the war, but not because I want it for war purposes. I think the rule ought to last the life of the Senate, but I do not object to its being in here for this reason: I believe that the Senate will find, if it tries it, that a reasonable limitation on debate will be beneficial to the transaction of the business of the Senate without depriving a Senator of any material right that he possesses in the body now. If that is so, and this rule is adopted, it runs for the period of the war. If my own view of the question is sustained by the trial, then I take it that the Senate at the end of the war will adopt the rule as a permanent part of the machinery of this body. On the other hand, if at the close of the war, when the rule dies of its own force, it has been demonstrated that the rule has not been efficient and effective and satisfactory to the Senate, I take it that the Senate will not reenact it, and it ought not to do so under those circumstances. So the question as to whether it is limited to the time of the war or whether it is not is not a material question with me, and it was not the cause of my advocating or proposing a rule of this kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume that the fundamental reason in the mind of the distinguished Senator from Alabama in advocacy of this rule is that it will facilitate the business of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is. There could be nothing else.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have now reached pretty nearly the middle of June. The Senate has passed every war bill that has come from the House of Representatives, and has passed every other important bill that has come from the House of Representatives, and has passed every appropriation bill that has come from the House of Representatives except the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, which we will doubtless pass to-morrow. How could we have made any greater progress if we had had this new rule than we have made?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to be serious about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to be serious about it, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. No doubt the Senator will be serious.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will. I want to be serious. I am not here complaining about the action of the Senate on legislation that has been pending before the body. I think there is some legislation we have had during these war times that would have been more expeditiously passed under this rule than under existing rules. I am not complaining that the Senate up to this time has not passed the great body of war legislation that is necessary. I do not say that. I could not say it, because it would not be sustained. But there never is a time, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said, when under the rules of the Senate we adjourn that we do not leave on the calendar of the Senate much important legislation that has been reported to the Senate for enactment, and I take it that having been reported to the Senate by a majority of the committee that has it in charge it is to be presumed that it is lawful and beneficial legislation either for the country or for the individuals involved.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I interrupt the Senator a minute further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has recently come from another body of which he was a distinguished Member, a body that has a cloture rule and has the previous question. The fact is, as I showed yesterday in a tabulation that I presented and which I very carefully prepared, that while the Senate had passed 10 per cent of the bills reported the House had passed only 2 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is correct in that statement, and yet it leads nowhere, nor does he accomplish anything by making the statement, and I will tell the Senator why, if he will allow me. There are 96 Members of this body. There are 435 Members, not including the Delegates, in the House of Representatives. Of necessity there are thousands of more bills introduced in the House of Representatives than there are in the Senate of the United States, as their calendar will show. Those bills are of just as much interest to the individual Members as the bills that are introduced here.

On the other hand, there are no more hours in the day for the House of Representatives to transact business than there are for the Senate of the United States. It has many more bills on its calendar than the Senate, with the same hours of the day to transact its business, and yet, by reason of numbers, it is a body that must of necessity move very much slower. The mere fact of calling the roll is an incumbrance to the transaction of business in the House of Representatives that is not here. When there is a quorum present in the Senate the calling of the roll is only the space of a few minutes, whereas, while I have seen roll calls in the House of Representatives which took 35 minutes, under the ordinary procedure it will take three-quarters of an hour, and four or five roll calls will consume almost the entire day. Therefore, notwithstanding the fact that the House has the power to order direct cloture, it must give some consideration and discussion to every measure that comes before it. There is the reason why the calendar of the House when the final adjournment comes should find on it bills of importance that are not acted upon. But there is no reason whatever, so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned, why this body should not, affirmatively or negatively, act upon every piece of legislation that has been reported and placed on the calendar of the Senate.

Of course, I recognize the fact that we are all human; that possibly some of those bills which are on the calendar are not taken up and acted upon because the majority of us do not wish to vote either in the affirmative or negative on the proposition, and we keep them on the calendar to avoid a direct vote. But that is not true of the bulk of them. It is not true of most of the bills that are left on the calendar. Most of the undisposed bills that are left on the calendar of the Senate, if presented to the Senate and an opportunity given for action, would be passed affirmatively, and the legislation would have gone on to the hopper of the House, where there might be an opportunity for favorable action. I think that is an excellent reason why we ought to expedite our business, aside from any war legislation.

But, more than that, I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire, my business as a United States Senator does not begin and end in this Chamber, and neither does his. We all have most important business both for the Senate and for our constituencies outside of this Hall. I think the real great criticism that rests at the Senate to-day is the lack of consideration of many important measures by the committees appointed by this body to report them to the Senate.

Having served in both Houses of the Congress, I am prepared to say that I think, as a rule, the business in the committees of the House of Representatives is far more carefully and earnestly considered than the same legislation is considered at the hands of the Senate committees. There are exceptions to that rule in matters of great importance; but as a rule that is true; and there is a reason for the rule that does not reflect on the Senate or upon Senators. That is because in the House of Representatives almost universally a Member has only one important committee assignment, and he has ample time to give his entire attention to the business before that committee. In the Senate, of necessity, with the size of the committees and their number, we all must be assigned to several more or less important committees, largely depending on the time during which we have served in this body. Therefore, the Members of the Senate do not have the opportunity to give that careful consideration to matters—I am not referring to some particular member of the committee, but I am speaking of the committees as a whole—to give that careful consideration to which they are entitled to bills which are presented to the committees.

I can say, without any reflection on any Senator or on the committees, that repeatedly I have sat in a committee of the Senate having most important legislation before it and having only a simulated quorum of six or seven Senators discussing the pending question for days, hearing the witnesses that came before the committee, and then, when the final vote was to take place on the measure, involving matters of great importance, Senators have appeared in the committee room to vote who had not heard the debate in committee, who had heard but little of the testimony, and who were voting on the request, suggestion, or information of some other individual Senator who was taking a partisan side of the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, does not the Senator from Alabama think the limitation ought to be on the committees, and that those Senators who do not attend committee meetings—and it is notorious some do not—ought to be excluded from occupying places on the committee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that ought to be remedied; but here is where my argument is leading to: If we had reasonable discussion in the Senate on many questions, a reasonable limitation of debate, this body could transact all of its business in one-half the time it now takes, in my judgment. That would free Members of the Senate to go to their committee rooms, to attend to the important business of making legislation—not passing it—for, whether it be here or in the House of Representatives, legislation is made in committee. There may be slight amendments here, but the real draft of legislation, its real study, its real molding and building and worth come from the committee. Were there such limitation of debate, we should have more time to consider these important matters in committees.

Furthermore, in the past, and especially in these days of war, there are hundreds and hundreds of questions of vast importance to the constituencies we represent which are continually coming before the executive departments of the Government that you and I do not have the time or opportunity to give consideration to, but which we are compelled by force of circumstances to send a clerk to attend to—matters of weighty influence that may involve the very life of great industries in our States or the happiness of thousands of the constituents that we represent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator differentiates between the two Houses because of the disparity in numbers. It has been a long time since I was honored with a seat in the body that has a cloture rule, but my recollection is that about one-half of the membership of the House of Representatives pass all the important bills, and I have seen very recently, when I have visited that distinguished body, that a little group of Representatives pass the pending bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think that is largely true; but that is due to the reason, I think, that in the House of Representatives legislation is considered carefully by the committees and that the membership of the House has great confidence in the committee which reports the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. The membership of the House has confidence on the belief that the majority will pass the bill because they have been ordered to do so in caucus, practically, which is the Committee on Rules.

Now, another point. I think the Senator from Alabama was a little rash a moment ago, at least that he had not given the matter careful consideration, when he said that we ought to pass every bill that is reported by a committee of this body.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. I said we ought to vote on every bill, not pass it; for a great many of those bills I myself should vote against.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will make that correction—that we ought to act on them. Now, will the Senator refer to the calendar and tell me how many days or weeks or months he thinks it would take us to act on all the bills which are on the calendar to-day? Why, Mr. President, the Senator would discover immediately that we should consume at least one day on the first bill, more than a day on the second, and so on down the list. For that reason, knowing that we can not pass these bills, and knowing that they would be debated—even under this proposed rule it would take days and days—we proceed to the calendar and pass bills that are not in controversy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I will take the Senator's statement as my text. If the Senator's statement is correct, that there are a number of bills on the calendar that we can not physically pass—and I doubt that; I think very often delays come in the Senate because we debate one bill in order that another bill may not be reached on the calendar—but if the Senator is correct in his statement that we have not the physical power by reason of the limitation of time to act on all the bills upon the calendar, I say we owe it to the country to pass a rule immediately limiting the term of debate.

If we must limit the term of debate, you may say we might not get all the bills through; but we should get more of them through; and if these bills are here for the benefit of the country and of the constituencies that we represent, they are entitled to action.

I say that the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire has admitted himself out of court when he says the calendar is composed of bills that the Senate as a body could not act on.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire does not agree to that at all. According to all my observations here, when contested bills are before the Senate there has not been a speech of an hour made on any one of the bills which are controverted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have speeches here of many hours on bills that are controverted, that take time away from the calendar, which could be devoted to other questions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I do not recall an instance of that kind during the present Congress, certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not saying that by way of reflection on any Senator, because I have heard a number of speeches here that took more than five hours which were most able speeches; I do not contend that the speeches were not able, and I know of a number of them—as a matter of fact, I have been guilty once myself since I have been in the Senate of speaking longer than the time prescribed by this proposed rule. I do not reflect on the ability of the speeches, but I say they are unnecessary. What I contend is that unlimited debate is not necessary, facing this business condition—and that is all it is, for there is nothing involved here but a business condition—unless we want to go back and flee from the ghost of the past and say that we must preserve the right to filibuster, to delay, and destroy business, because, forsooth, there may be some ghost stalking behind the rights and liberties of the people whom you and I represent. Since I have been a Member of the legislative bodies of the Congress of the United States the hour has never come—and I would be unworthy of the great constituency which I represent if I allowed it ever to come—when through fear I would be unwilling to do my duty to my country because I thought that some unseen force might some day invade the rights of the constituency that I represent.

Mr. President, I have more faith and more confidence in the integrity, the patriotism, and the honesty of purpose of the American people than to believe that one section of this Union intends to take an unfair and unholy advantage of another section of the Union in this hour and day.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Why not have faith in the integrity and honesty of purpose and patriotism of the Members of this body so as not to desire to handicap them by a rule limiting debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have all confidence in their integrity, honesty, and character; I have not disputed that; but I have not so much confidence in the vanity of any of them. We all enjoy hearing ourselves talk. Men who are engaged in our profession in life like to hear words flowing from our own mouths, and our own vanity often carries us beyond the pale that is necessary for us to perform the duties we owe to our constituencies. I am sure that my friend from Indiana will agree with me in that, and we can both at times plead guilty to the charge.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I did not rise primarily for the purpose of asking the question which I addressed to the Senator from Alabama; it came almost unbidden to my lips. What I really wanted to ask the Senator was this: Is he not willing to amend this proposed rule so that it shall not apply to the consideration of treaties? To me the most repugnant feature of this proposed amendment to the rules is that it applies to treaties. I believe that when this war shall have been concluded the Senate of the United States will stand face to face with the greatest problems that have ever confronted any legislative body in the history of the world, because growing out of this war there will be new world relations of such overweening consequence and importance that the Members of this body ought not to be handicapped to one hour and a half of speech on questions of such prodigious import.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from Indiana that if I really thought that there was anything serious in his proposal I would agree with him, because the treaties that come before the Senate occupy a comparatively small amount of our time. What I am trying to do in this direction is solely for the purpose of expediting the public business; expediting it, it is true, by infringing slightly upon the privilege of individual Senators, but the effort is to expedite public business. That is my only desire. I know that, as a rule, treaties consume very little of our time, and if that is all that was involved I would say "yes"; I would agree with the Senator; but I will tell him why I do not agree with him and why I do not think the proposed rule ought to be amended in the particular he suggests, because no treaties of importance will come before the Senate of the United States for action before this rule of itself will die.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; the proposed rule provides that it shall not die by its own limitation until after the war has been concluded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, that may require the action of the Senate; but I can make my idea clear to the Senator if he will allow me.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We are not likely to enter into any material treaties, any treaties of importance, that will bring about general discussion, until the peace treaty comes, because the world will not undertake to make treaties in regard to other matters until the war is over. Now, there is a treaty pending here concerning alien slackers, in connection with which I doubt if there will be an hour's discussion.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a suggestion there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FALL. That treaty, of course, has been discussed to some extent and has been referred to this morning. There will necessarily be legislation accompanying that treaty, because it can not be self-acting, and the situation will be this: The objection to the treaty, I think, will be confined perhaps to one article or one provision, and the discussion will be entirely upon an amendment with regard to it. I do not agree with the Senator as to the importance of the amendment which may be offered. I am inclined to think that unless the treaty itself may be amended we will find ourselves in the position of ratifying the treaty and the Congress of the United States refusing legislation to carry it into effect.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator, because he knows the condition and is better informed about that particular treaty and that situation than most of us, if the question comes before the Senate, does he not think that he could present his views on the subject in the Senate in an hour and a half?

Mr. FALL. I would not have an opportunity to do so, because the discussion would be upon an amendment to the treaty. I might agree to the treaty itself without any hesitation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under this rule the Senator would have a full hour and a half.

Mr. FALL. So far as I am personally concerned, I will very frankly say that it would not require 10 minutes for me to express my views upon it; but I would possibly very strenuously resist legislation putting the treaty as it stands into effect.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well; but, answering the Senator from Indiana, there is no really great and important treaty coming before the Senate, with the exception of the peace treaty; and as to that I know of no peace treaty in the history of this country, and very few in the history of the world in recent generations, that has not been made in the open, that has not been ratified in the open, and that has not been considered in the open. The secret treaties of nations about which we complain, and justly complain, are not peace treaties, but they are treaties that are made subsequent to the ratification of peace treaties. More than that, when the final peace treaty is made there will be representatives of this Government sent to The Hague, or somewhere else, meeting with our allied friends and sitting at the table with our belligerent enemies, agreeing on the terms on which this war shall cease and the world shall stay at peace in the future. Every word of that consideration is going to be given to the public, just as the deliberations of the commissioners who represented this country at Paris when we met to make peace with Spain were given to the public.

Mr. WATSON. But was not the discussion in the Senate of long duration on the question of the treaty of peace with Spain?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it was of very long duration.

Mr. WATSON. Was it not quite lengthy, and was not the debate participated in by numerous Senators?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It lasted about as long, or perhaps a little longer, than the debate on the pending resolution proposing a simple amendment to the rules of the Senate has lasted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think, if the Senator will recall the circumstances, that he will agree that the question of the payment of $20,000,000 to Spain for the Philippines excited a great deal of discussion here and aroused much party antagonism.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true; but the discussion did not last so very long, and it was all carried on on the open floor of the Senate; the discussion was not behind closed doors.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true; but the rule applies either way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but what I say is that, in my judgment—I may be wrong, but I do not think I am—when this vital treaty of peace is made next year or the year after or 10 years from now, and the commissioners representing this Government and the Chief Executive sign the agreement for peace, whether it comes before us or some other Senate, no Senator will reject the terms and send the world back to fight out again a world war. If that is the case, then when that treaty of peace is signed this rule goes out of existence. So, I say, the question of considering treaties is a matter of small importance so far as this rule is concerned.

I have trespassed upon the time of the Senate longer than I intended, because there are other Senators who desire to debate the resolution; but I think the real and sole question that is before the Senate, in considering whether this rule should be adopted or rejected, can be but one thing. I am going to exclude the question of a filibuster. I am going to exclude the proposition that any Senator will stand in his place here and say that he, as a Senator, has the right to use the power of delay to force his colleagues to agree to terms to which they are not willing to agree.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senate had had that in mind, this is a most admirable opportunity for a filibuster.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure.

Mr. GALLINGER. And this rule never could have been adopted at the present session if those of us who are opposed to it had determined that it should not be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator. I think the Senate have taken due time for the consideration of this rule, but I think they have treated its consideration very fairly. But I think if the Senate had filibustered on this rule they would have waked up the American people to the fact that we had a body here that had lost its power of action. I think the bell would have rung on the United States Senate in the ears of the American people if this rule had been defeated by a filibuster. But I disclaim anything of that kind. If, in the heart of any Senator, he desires to defeat the rule because he wants to retain in his own hands the right to filibuster, and to defeat the will of the majority here by reason of a filibuster, I do not think he would be willing to proclaim that on this floor to the people of the United States; and, more than that, I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor whose action, in his mature deliberation, would be governed by any such motive.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Excluding that question, excluding the power of filibuster, I say it comes down to but one question as to whether this rule should be adopted or not; and before I state that question I will yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. While the Senator from Alabama was talking about the question of filibustering, did we not absolutely prevent the possibility of a filibuster, as far as it could be prevented, by the amendment of the rules last summer?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You did prevent the possibility of the individual filibuster, but not of a united filibuster. I think the rule passed last summer is ineffective and inoperative so far as ordinary business is concerned. Therefore, I think something else ought to be done. Where a few men want to filibuster, I am free to admit that that rule will largely cut off their ability to do so, but where more than a third desire to filibuster it will be ineffective; and I will go further than that. I am willing to admit, because I want to be perfectly fair on the record, that if more than a third of the Senate desire to filibuster on any proposition coming before it, under the rule that I have presented they can maintain a filibuster that will prevent action; and therefore I am eliminating the question of a filibuster from my discussion of this question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Where has there been the slightest indication that a third or smaller number of the Senate during the war have desired to do such a thing?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not charged it. The Senator asked me a question, and I merely replied with a hypothetical case. I did not say it had occurred.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator, just briefly?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. If, without this rule, we voted a declaration of war, and if without it we voted the policy of conscription, and if without it we appropriated all the vast sums of money essential to carrying on this war up to this time, and if without it we cast all the power on the President that he has—authority so great that it is not necessary for us to stand here and attempt to estimate it in words—and if we have already passed the tax bill, which has outlined the policy on which the coming tax bill must be laid; if all that has been done without this rule, and in effect all the work that the war requires of us has already been faithfully performed without it, why the adoption of this rule at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will not answer my good friend from Indiana, because the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asked me that question some half hour or more ago, and so far as my viewpoint was concerned I answered it fully in the RECORD; and as there are other Senators who want to speak this morning, I will not occupy the time to repeat what I then said, with the leave of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber at that time——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand.

Mr. WATSON. And I was not aware that the query had been propounded.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HALE. During the debate yesterday I gave some figures that were compiled for me by the clerks of the Library of the Senate, showing that from April 4, 1917, to April 8, 1918, a period of over a year, only 75 speeches had been made which consumed over an hour and a half each, and that the surplus time over an hour and a half each amounted only to 68½ hours during the whole year. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he thinks that is an inordinate excess for the year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, yes; I think so. I do not mean as to all of them, the men that only spoke an hour and a half; but that is just exactly what I am coming to, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. HALE. Also, I should like to ask the Senator this question: During the debate on the revenue bill, which took seven weeks, there were only 11 speeches which took over an hour and a half, and they only took up an excess time of 11½ hours during the whole time. Does the Senator consider that excessive?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The eleven hours and a half may have brought the Senate to a point where it was impossible to do business for the balance of the day, and it had to adjourn; but I am coming right down now to answer the Senator's question in my own way.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I make a correction there? The revenue bill was only before the Senate for 35 days. It was in the committee for 74 days. I think the Senator may have been misled by the fact that it was reported and was afterwards recommitted. The debate lasted only 35 days.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I heard what the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts had to say about the time these bills remain in conference and those delays. Now, I have been in conferences. I am on a conference now that is long delayed. It is long delayed because the conferees are trying to obey the will of the Senate. The legislative bill has been in conference for more than a month——

Mr. SMOOT. Two months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Two months, because the Senate has instructed its conferees. We brought the bill back here and asked for further consideration. The Senate insisted on its original position, that there should be no amendment wiping out the Subtreasuries of this country, and that we should not agree to what is known as the Borland amendment in the House bill. The House will not agree with us, and we are obeying the will of the Senate; but that does not affect the business of this body. When a bill goes out of this body to conference, it is no longer standing in the way of the legislative machinery. The balance of the business of the Senate can go on, and is not delayed on that account; and, so far as that particular bill is concerned, it will be agreed to by one House or the other yielding before the 1st of July. We know that. One side or the other must yield, and the bill must pass; and, as the appropriations are not available until the 1st of July, the delay up to this time is not material.

In conclusion, I want to say this: Excluding the question as to whether this resolution would stop a filibuster, excluding the question as to whether any Senator would desire unlimited debate for a filibuster, and to exercise his individual power against the majority of his colleagues, I say then that the question of whether this resolution should be accepted or rejected resolves itself to one single proposition, and that is the proposition as to whether, within an hour and a half, an individual Senator can present his views on pending legislation so that the Senate can understand them, and so that he can fairly represent the constituency from which he holds his commission.

I do not think that is difficult. On the main proposition of any bill that is pending here, I think any Member of this body can present his views fully, clearly, and forcefully within an hour and a half. If it comes down to the details, he either accepts the details in bulk or he objects to them, and proposes his objection by an amendment, and when he comes to that amendment what he wants is an audience more than an argument; and under the present procedure of the Senate and its long debate he usually fails of the audience, and in that way fails to get a fair and just consideration of his amendment, no matter how righteous it may be.

You can point in this history of this body to some great speeches, forceful speeches, effective speeches, that have taken more than an hour and a half; but I am willing to say, and believe that I can not be contradicted, that the speeches in the Senate of the United States since the beginning that have had effect on legislation, that have produced results in the Nation, that stand as monuments of statesmanship and oratorical ability in the past, have been delivered within less than an hour and a half. There is one speech that will stand forever in the minds and the hearts of the American people—a speech that will ring around the world as long as the Stars and Stripes may fly over the dome of this Capitol as the proclamation of a renewed Nation, a proclamation of peace, a proclamation of a united people, a proclamation of the great principles of liberty and freedom for which our Government stands—the speech that Abraham Lincoln delivered at Gettysburg; and it did not take 20 minutes to deliver that great oration.

Mr. President, I think that when the great speeches of the world have been made within this limitation of debate, the individual Senator who occupies a seat on this floor should content himself, in the interest of public business, to limit himself to an hour and a half in presenting his views.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama speaks of the short and memorable speech of President Lincoln at Gettysburg. Of course, that was an inspiration. It was one of the greatest utterances that ever fell from human lips; but there was even a shorter speech than that, delivered a little while ago, which will live for all time, and that was the speech of Joffre at the Marne, when he said to the soldiers of France, in a death struggle with the Germans, "They shall not pass!"

I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that it is not a question of long speeches, nor words, nor the failure to get a hearing that prompts us to oppose this proposition. It is because times do arise in this Chamber when it is necessary to use the language of Gen. Joffre; when matters affecting vitally a Senator's own State are of such transcendent importance that persistent and relentless opposition is justified; and when that time comes it is not the long speech nor the audience that is important; it is the power to prevent the wrong.

Why, the Senator from Alabama has made a most interesting speech to-day. He has been speaking for about 45 minutes. He has made a good speech, as he always does. He has made it under limitation of debate, and yet he had just three Senators listening to him on his own side of the Chamber; and cloture will not get any better results. Senators will not stay here just to listen to speeches. They never do. I have heard some of the greatest men who ever sat in this body make most interesting speeches to empty chairs.

The Senator from Alabama said a few moments ago that the Senate was not what it used to be——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not quote me on that subject unless he sends and gets my language.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, I will not attempt to quote the Senator at all, because I may do him an injustice, and I do not want to do so; but the Senator did refer in a most complimentary way to former Senators, and he did say that the situation had changed. Now, if the situation with reference to Senators has changed, the situation with reference to the States has not changed. The States are as potential as they ever were in this Chamber. We have not admitted over six or eight Senators in the last 30 years. Most of the States admitted in that time have been admitted by the vote of my friend from Alabama and myself, and only about eight Senators have been added to this body in the last quarter of a century. The States remain as intelligent and patriotic as they ever were. Even the State of the Senator from Alabama is exactly as patriotic and intelligent as when it was represented in this Chamber by the great Senator Morgan. The State of Massachusetts is just as patriotic and intelligent as it was when it was represented here by the great Webster. My State is entitled to as much consideraion in this Chamber, even though I am one of its Senators, as when it was represented by Lewis Cass and Zachariah Chandler. The States have not changed; and it is for their potentjality, It is to preserve their rights, that I oppose this curtailment of debate.

The Senator said a few moments ago that no treaty could arise perhaps that would be so vexatious as to call for greater discussion than that provided for under the proposed rule. We have a treaty now, and I think I am violating no confidence, it has been referred to two or three times this morning, which changes the basic draft law by which our Army has been formed, a treaty which walks into my State and says to a Canadian who has taken out his first papers and renounced his allegiance to his own country that he must return. Yet you propose by cloture, limited debate, to so change the law that a foreign country may walk in and take possession of that citizen between the ages of 18 and 49 years and force him in the Army, and I am told that if I desire to protest I must do it in private, if I have any indignation to express I must do it briefly. The States still have some inherent rights, and injustice must not be tolerated by Senators. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who lives along the Canadian border who does not know the delicacy and importance of the questions constantly arising out of our joint sovereignty; yet I am asked to discriminate against my own State and its sovereign rights by foreclosing myself against the power of forcible resistance.

Does the Senator from Alabama approve the filibuster made in this Chamber a few years ago against the force bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the Senator knows that I am against the force bill; that I am thoroughly in favor of local self-government; and believe that the situation in each State in reference to its electorate should be controlled by the people of that State. I am free to say that I think the result of the filibuster on the force bill was a result that was most effective for good in the State in which I live and for good in the Nation. But I have no fear whatever that if that filibuster had failed and the purpose had been accomplished to take away from the State in which I reside the right of an intelligent, safe government of the people of that State, in the next election the people of the whole United States would have rejected the party that accomplished the result and the law would have been wiped from the statute book.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator approves of the filibuster on the force bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not mean to say that you can not point out some instances in which a filibuster may be right. There may be an instance where a man may be justified in killing another man to save his own life, but that does not justify murder. Because you may point out an instance where a filibuster works for good does not justify the system of filibustering.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I guess I am not overstating it when I say that the instrumentality by which Senators from Southern States defeated the House bill known as the force bill is justified by the remark of the Senator from Alabama. Why does the Senator from Alabama justify it? Because his State was to be vitally affected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not at all. I will say to the Senator my record on this floor does not bear that out at all. I would have voted against the force bill, because I do not believe that the Government of the United States has a right to interfere with the domestic affairs of my State, and I would have opposed it here, if I had been sitting here on this floor, as vigorously as possible, but not alone because it affects the rights of my State. I want to say to the Senator there has been an instance in the recent past which demonstrates the difference. My State is a prohibition State. My people are in favor of the prohibition of the sale of liquor in the State. Although it is not the case now in the Senator's State, it was a short time ago; but there are great States in the Union—New York and Pennsylvania—that do not agree with the same idea of my people about their local matters, who do not want prohibition, and I voted against a Nation-wide prohibition amendment, not so far as it related to my State, but because I was unwilling for the Federal Government to invade the domestic rights and freedom of States that were sisters to Alabama in the Union.

It was on the same principle I voted against a nation-wide prohibition amendment, that I would have invoked had I been on this floor, against a nation-wide control of the electorate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Those States in the South that were vitally affected by the national election laws felt it their duty to use every instrumentality at their command to defeat it, and Alabama was no exception to the rule.

What I claim is this: That the right of the State may become seriously impaired if we depend solely for the maintenance of that right upon a limited, circumscribed, restricted debate. I do not want to repeat what I have said once or twice before, but which is nevertheless true, that this power which you seek to curtail is a power that goes with the senatorial office. If anything is to be done in this Chamber, and I see there are only five Democratic Senators on the other side of the Chamber, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has to be consulted about it, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has to be consulted about it, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] must all be consulted. No one can do anything in this Chamber under the historic traditional and useful rules of this body until every other Senator is ready, and that is the best part of the senatorial service. When that time is passed I warn Senators who do not happen to be in positions of leadership that they will not be consulted, and I tell them now that they have not been consulted about this rule. There is not a Senator sitting on the other side of the Chamber at this moment who has ever been consulted about bringing in this rule. There is not one of them who knew it was to be brought in, and they will know much less about it when all that their privilege consists of is the right to get up and talk for 60 minutes. They will never be consulted in the future.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the championship of the Senator from Alabama of this new rule, it is rather interesting to note that in 1841, when Henry Clay proposed that this body should have a restricted rule, Mr. King, of Alabama, informed Senator Clay he had better make arrangements with his boarding house keeper for the winter months.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is fine, and that comes from one of the great men whom the Senator from Alabama has recently eulogized. I wish the Senator from Alabama were here now. I should like to have him get the full force and effect of that remark. Mr. King evidently felt that there were some questions which came before the Senate which ought not to be disposed of too hastily; and the Senator from Alabama ought to know it, although his service has been principally in the House of Representatives. The Senator from New Hampshire does know it, as does every other Senator who has served here very long.

I am under a sort of modified cloture. It is quite unnecessary, however. I will not prolong the discussion, but I beg of Senators to consider well this proposal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gulon	Norris	Smith, Md.
Baird	Hale	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Harding	Overman	Smoot
Borah	Hitchcock	Page	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Cummins	Lenroot	Reed	Tillman
Curtis	Lewis	Robinson	Townsend
Dillingham	Lodge	Sanisbury	Trammell
Fall	McKellar	Shafroth	Underwood
France	McNary	Sheppard	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sherman	Watson
Gallinger	Nelson	Simmons	Weeks
Gronna	New	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] if he desires to take the floor. The Senator suggested yesterday that he would desire to address himself to this rule, and if he desires to take the floor I will content myself by taking my chances during the 10 minutes' debate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to say to those of my colleagues who were absent and have been brought in by the roll call that I am not responsible for the call, either directly or indirectly. While in the habit of speaking to audiences who sometimes listen, and while it is always somewhat embarrassing to attempt to make speeches on the floor of the United States Senate to empty seats, nevertheless, it seems to be the custom, and I presume that I, in common with my associates, must be the victim of the usage.

It is not now before the Senate as to whether any treaty shall be considered in open or in executive session, and yet, because it has a direct bearing on the other question at issue, I desire to say that I voted in favor of the amendment brought forward by the honorable Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I would not ordinarily have pursued this course, because it runs counter to some of my ideas as to the consideration of treaties with foreign nations, but I did so in this instance because I believed it to be the best method of meeting the situation that immediately confronts us.

We have been much mystified of late by the frequent and mysterious conferences between the President of the United States and Col. House touching our foreign relations, matters in regard to which the Senate of the United States knows comparatively little; and we have been informed by the public press that Justice Brandeis and Col. House have been chosen for some diplomatic mission the exact object of which we do not know. Their precise powers we are not acquainted with, the limit of their authority we are not apprised of; but yet I predict that it is but a notice to the people of the United States that when the time comes to prepare the treaty that shall conclude the great war in which we are now engaged these two men, alone or with others, shall sit in the council chamber of the nations to formulate that document. Against these men I have naught to say, but as to their public service so far as diplomacy is concerned we have no knowledge. We know that Justice Brandeis, judging by his speeches and utterances in the days gone by, is a near socialist, and of the diplomatic experience of Col. House we have but meager knowledge. Therefore if these men and men of their type and belief are to formulate the treaty that shall conclude this great war, I welcome all the publicity that can be given that instrument and its formulation and the successive steps that shall lead up to its adoption.

I do not know what the conclusion of this strife may bring in the way of a treaty; but I do know that we shall be confronted with socialism, national and international, and therefore if men of the political ideas of those who have been chosen to arrange our diplomatic affairs at this time are to formulate that treaty I think the light of day should be cast upon all their transactions; that every phrase of the document should be debated; that its every clause should be discussed so that, if possible, we may be able to discover even the thoughts of such diplomats in order to acquaint the public with the motives that impel them to their adopted course.

Mr. President and Senators, we are all aware of the fact that there is a movement throughout the world that will plunge the nations of the earth into the vortex of socialistic revolution at the conclusion of this war unless, being warned, we come full armed to the conflict. We know that this socialistic movement has as one of its objects the abolition of the upper houses of all the legislative bodies of the world. That is a part of their announced program, and knowing it, we should not willingly take the first step in that direction unless we are willing to take others that shall follow; and, if adopted, this measure may prove to be that first step.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama said before taking his seat that the greatest speeches that have been made in the Senate of the United States in the past have been comparatively short ones. That is true as to some of them, but I call the attention of my honorable friend to the fact that if this rule had been in force in the Continental Congress many of the great historical utterances that laid broad and deep the enduring foundations of the Republic and pointed the inevitable pathway of the future would have been but partially delivered. If this had been the rule of the United States Senate after the adoption of the Constitution and the formation of the Union many of the great orations that challenged the attention of mankind and fashioned the policy of the Republic would have been but partially delivered. If this had been the rule of the United States Senate for the first 50 years of its existence John C. Calhoun would not have been able to thunder forth the doctrines in which he believed; Hayne could not have announced on the floor the ideas which he so eloquently espoused; Henry Clay would have been unable to deliver in full any one of the score of speeches that accomplished so much for his country; and Daniel Webster, imperious orator of American history, could not have blazed the pathway of the future in that historic utterance in which he announced the essential policies of the Republic if its institutions are to endure, for on the floor of the United States Senate and in the open forum of debate he in a sense shaped the destiny of the Republic and molded the future of the Nation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Speaking for eight hours.

Mr. WATSON. And eight hours, the Senator from New Hampshire informs me, he spent in delivering that masterful oration.

If this had been the rule of the United States Senate before and during the Civil War Charles Sumner could not have sounded forth his great philippic against the barbarism of slavery, nor could any one of the masterful orators or statesmen who then occupied seats in this Chamber have voiced the sentiments of the sons of freedom that inspired the mighty North to action and led great armies to the fields of strife, for the principles of the perpetuity of the Union and the freedom of the slave were fought out upon the floor of the Senate before they were fought out upon the crimson fields of battle.

If this had been the rule of the Senate even in our day, the great debates that have occurred upon the financial and economic problems which have engaged the thought and attention of the Republic could not have taken place to the full.

I vividly recall the time when the railway-rate bill was up for consideration in this body, when the Senate cleared the decks for action, and when for 70 consecutive days this great problem was debated, involving as it did the question of the relationship of the railroads to the Government, the relationship of capital to labor, and all kindred and associate questions. I recall that Spooner and Bailey and Bacon and Foraker and other great men whose utterances challenged the attention of the people for hours at a time discussed those problems in as enlightening a debate as ever occurred on this floor. Had this proposed rule then been in force such discussion would have been largely impossible.

Why, Senators, in this very debate that is now occupying the time of the Senate the only speeches that exceeded the limit set forth in this rule were those of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is sponsor for the measure, and of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has been one of its principal advocates. And it is worthy of more than passing notice that the able Senator from Iowa occupied the floor for well-nigh three hours trying to convince the Senate that nobody should be permitted to speak for more than an hour and a half.

The real question involved is not one of limitation upon the length of debate so much as it is of the object of debate. No matter how long a Senator can talk, if his speech is upon the subject matter of discussion and is intended to enlighten and instruct, there should be no limit upon his speech.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said in his address, and, too, in rather a sarcastic way, that "The Senate of the United States is not a debating school," and, as I now remember, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] he made the assertion that "This body should not treat itself as a superchautauqua nor should it be so considered by others."

Senators, I believe the assertion of Woodrow Wilson, the historian, when he said that the informing functions of this body are even of more vital consequence than its legislative functions. In that sentiment I most heartily concur.

Mr. President, where are great principles of government first announced? Largely upon the floor of this and its associate body. Where are fundamental ideas first expounded? Largely in legislative halls. Our Army is mobilized about fundamental principles; it does not blindly rush forward without thought. Battalions are mobilized about sublime ideals. They are not vaguely and indefinitely led. If you were to ask any soldier in the Army of the United States for what he is fighting, he could give you a ready response. He knows what animates and impels him as he rushes to the battle field. Where were these great ideas first enunciated in the Republic of the United States? In this forum and over yonder in the associate body of Congress.

If you were to say to any one of these soldiers that he was in this war to fling wider the boundaries of the Republic and for territorial acquisition he would resent it. If you were to say to him that he is fighting in this war and leveling his gun against the breasts of the German enemy from motives of revenge, he, in his anger, would strike you down. He knows what animates him. It throbs in his heart as he stands in the trenches; it pulses in his breast as he leaps "over the top" and plunges toward the savage foe. Where were these great principles announced? On the floor of this and its associate body, repeated with splendid emphasis all over this country by orators, by lecturers, and by professors; repeated in the newspapers; repeated in the magazines with splendid iteration until the whole atmosphere of America is vocal with eloquent defense of the mighty principles that are involved in this great contest. So this may be called a debating society; but, after all, it is a body from which goes information that is vital to the welfare of the Republic and to the dearest concerns of its people. For that reason I object to this proposed limitation upon debate.

Mr. President and Senators, I am opposed to the passage of this resolution, because it is pointless, useless, and needless at this time. Why should it be thrust into this body and adopted now? Has the Senate been guilty of any policy of retardation? Have we thrust any obstacle in the way of the success of this conflict? Has there been one hour of filibuster since the declaration of war was made? What has the Senate done to warrant the Senator from Alabama in leading the people of the United States to believe that we have betrayed our trust and have not lived up to the demands of the hour? This resolution gives weight to the charge throughout the country that we have been derelict in our duty; that we have been false to the great trust reposed in us by the people of the United States.

Without this rule the Senate has been operating splendidly for 140 years of American history. We fought the American Revolution without it; we fought the War of 1812 without it; we fought the Mexican War without it; we fought the Civil War without it; we fought the Spanish-American War without it; and we have largely prepared for this war without it. So, with all that history behind us, with all this proud acquisition and these ineffaceable results, what reason is there for the adoption of this measure at this time? There is something else behind it, and that something else, I believe, is to affect the very life of the United States Senate in the years that are yet to be.

We voted a declaration of war without this rule; we voted the policy of conscription without this rule; we have appropriated sums that stagger the imagination without this rule. We have cast power into the right hand of the President Alp upon Alp, and in his left hand Ossa upon Pelion, until he sits to-day clothed with authority greater than that of any of the rulers of the earth; aye, greater than that of any king or despot since the olden days when rulers claimed authority over life and over limb, and all this without the interposition of this rule. Then, why is it thrust upon us now? Oh, my friend from Alabama, distinguished and honorable in career and in service, says it is for the purpose of securing the speedy enactment of the coming tax law.

Mr. President, we passed the last tax law without it, and when we formulate the principles upon which the coming tax law is to be considered and enacted no new policy will be adopted, no new thought will be embodied. It will be but higher taxes along the same line. If, as the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said, it was 129 days from the day of the first consideration of that measure until it was signed by the President, and it contained all of the policies to be embodied in the coming measure, why should it take longer to pass the coming bill than it did to pass the last one?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that we completely changed the policy of the last tax law, due to the convictions that were evolved through the debate.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. It is very appropriate and timely, because it is true that from the time the debate began on the last tax law until it was completed in this body the policy of that law was changed, and, I believe, changed to the good and changed in the interest of the people of the United States. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It is quite significant also that the colleague of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offered a new scheme of taxation in the Senate after the bill had come from the committee, and his new ideas, the suggestions which he offered, and the valuable contribution which he made to the debate were largely responsible for some of the important emendations in the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator from Utah for that suggestion also. The conclusion of it all is that the policy outlined before will be again adopted, and the broad lines previously laid down will be again followed—that no new idea, so far as policy is concerned, is to be thought of in connection with this new bill. Therefore it will be a comparatively easy task to pass the forthcoming legislation.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, standing in his place on the floor recently, said that it was not necessary to pass the tax bill at this time in order to get the money to run the Government; that the Ways and Means Committee could easily meet on the 1st of November to begin the consideration of the measure, and that, if passed by the 1st of February, it would be amply sufficient for all the purposes of the Government. I assume that he knew whereof he spoke. So there is no occasion for undue haste in the enactment of this proposed tax law. If there is no excuse for this measure other than this proposition, there is no reason why it should not be defeated here.

I am sorry that this resolution has been thrust into this body at this time, because, as I said before, it gives weight to the charge that the Senate of the United States has been guilty of a policy of retardation in the enactment of important legislation since the beginning of this war. That I absolutely deny, and I challenge any Senator in the Senate to rise in his place and name me one hour of useless debate which has been indulged in for the purpose of retardation; I challenge any Senator to name any effort to throw the slightest obstruction in the pathway of legitimate legislation since the beginning of this war. It can not be done, and my friend from Alabama says that it can not be done, because it has not occurred.

We all know that some zealous administration organs have from time to time throughout the course of this conflict published to the people of the country that the Senate of the United States was blocking the wheels of progress, and they have been constantly crying to us, "Hurry up; amend the rules of the Senate, so that we can get speedy legisation." But, Mr. President, the policy of retardation must be looked for in other departments; it must be searched for in other quarters, and can not be laid at the door of the Senate of the United States; for I challenge a contradiction of the statement when I say that in a narrow space of time we have passed legislation unparalleled both in quantity and in quality, and heretofore unequaled in the legislative annals of the world. Therefore, as the President of the United States himself so well said in the eulogy which he pronounced upon the Congress of the country for the great work which it had accomplished, we have the right to deny that we have been guilty of any policy of obstruction or retardation since the inception of this conflict.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator from Indiana that Mr. Arthur Balfour, who was at the head of the great mission which visited the United States from England, and who is, perhaps, one of the most studious of the English statesmen, upon his departure from this country, in speaking of the action of the Congress of the United States, said, in effect, that it had dealt with greater, broader, and more profound subjects more expeditiously, perhaps, than had any other legislative body in the world?

Mr. WATSON. I recall reading the interview, and I feel quite sure that we were all deeply gratified by the eulogy pronounced upon this body and its associate body by the distinguished statesman from England. In examining the history of legislation in England and in France we will find by comparison that ours has been enacted with more speed; that we have not only not delayed but that we have pushed; that we have not only not procrastinated but that we have, whenever opportunity offered, hastened legislation necessary for the prosecution of this conflict.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, he might also state that we have put into the Treasury of the United States through our legislation billions of dollars which the executive departments have been unable to expend.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I think that is true; and yet I shall not withhold from them the due meed of praise to which they are entitled by saying that they are doing fairly well at that project.

Mr. McCUMBER. But they are still far behind.

Mr. WATSON. Yes. I further object to the passage of this resolution because it seems to come from somewhere outside of this Chamber. I utter nothing in derogation of the distinguished Senator who stands sponsor for this resolution here, but nevertheless it is an open secret that the hand of the Chief Executive of the Nation is behind this resolution, and that he is seeking its adoption and asking for its speedy approval. I believe that the resolution which was read into the RECORD by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] should be repeated here, because it embodies the principle which I think should actuate the Senate in all its dealings with the President of the United States when an attempt is made to throttle debate on the part of the Senate, to interfere with the orderly procedure of legislation in the Senate of the United States; and, if there be no objection, I ask to incorporate the resolution referred to as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That any attempt on the part of a President of the United States to exercise the powers and influence of his great office for the purpose of controlling the vote of any Senator upon a question involving the right to a seat in the Senate, or any other matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Senate, would violate the spirit, if not the letter of the Constitution and invade the rights of the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Why, Senators, we are not children; we are men. We are not playing with castles of cards; we are dealing with fundamental problems. We are not engaged in some sport in which a man is limited to a certain number of strikes; we are Senators, chosen because of supposed ability, fitness, and character to measure up to the great demands of statesmanship, to grapple with the eternal verities that underlie all progress and all enduring government, and why should it be thought that we must place a limitation upon ourselves else we shall trample upon the rights of the people by too great speech? The whole thing is to me the very height of the preposterous.

I do not know why the President of the United States has been fit to demand the adoption of such a resolution. He has praised Congress for its work; he has lauded us for our accomplishments; he has eulogized us for our achievements. Why, then, this effort on his part to choke off debate and to limit the right of speech in the Senate of the United States?

I said a moment ago that there was a well-defined movement throughout the world to abolish the upper chambers in all legislatures national in character in the whole world. Can it be that this is but the forerunner of an effort to be made in the days to come to abolish the Senate of the United States and have only the supposed popular branch of the legislature remain? There is, I repeat, a well-defined movement elsewhere along that line, and while I have very great respect for the President of the United States, I violate no confidence—for I am not in his confidence—when I say that we all understand that the President is very much of an internationalist and has very many of what are called internationalist views with which many of us are not in accord.

I do not know what the coming treaty of peace may contain or embody. Therefore I am opposed to a limitation that will prevent the free discussion of all the problems involved and all the fundamentals embodied. I am opposed to this resolution because it will interfere with a full discussion of the treaty when it comes to this body. I asked my friend from Alabama a few moments ago as to that, and he responded that, after the treaty was made, it would be so momentous in its consequences, it would deal with such prodigious problems, that we would be ready to accept it without question, and perhaps without debate. That I deny. I do not know what the future may hold; the mantle of prophecy has not descended on my shoulders; I can not lift the veil and peer into the future, but I do know that, whatever that treaty may contain, it will do no injury if the Senate of the United States is free to discuss it and to bring its provisions to the people of the United States and flood them with the daylight that should be cast upon them. That we do know; and yet, Senators, when that great treaty shall be brought into this body, if this is to become the rule, each Senator will be permitted to speak but an hour and a half. We shall hear only the voice of the schoolmaster asking each one to stand up and recite his little piece and then sit down, and at the end of that time we shall twirl our thumbs and engage in the most farcical pantomime the ages have ever witnessed, and in the meantime the consideration of the treaty will not proceed duly and acceptably to the people.

Most momentous problems will be involved; stupendous questions will confront us; the whole future of civilization will be wrapped up in the terms of that treaty; and yet we are to sit still, with sealed lips and bridled tongues, and fail to express ourselves upon the mighty problems that it is our solemn duty to discuss.

I am against this resolution for that reason. I believe that, under all the circumstances, it is a veiled attempt to do something which, according to the prophecy of its sponsors, can not be done.

There is no occasion for this change. It comes from the outside, and from a source that has no right to interfere with the discussions of the United States Senate; and I believe that after the war is over, after all "the battle flags are furled" and brought back home, it will be essential for this body to assert its rights, to maintain its privileges, and to stand upon its ground, in order that those flags may be unfurled in a country where the three independent and coordinate branches of Government remain untouched. I believe that those flags will not be so unfurled unless the Senate of the United States shall maintain its rights, guaranteed by the Constitution given us by the fathers. Then, when the flags are brought back home, they will continue in the future, as in the past, to wave above a Republic where liberty is regulated by law and where the sublime slogan of the Republic is equality and fraternity.

Mr. FALL. I offer an amendment to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending at the present time.

Mr. FALL. The amendment I offer is an amendment to the substitute. The pending matter is the substitute of the Senator from Iowa, and to that I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "resolution," at the end of line 8 of the amendment proposed by Mr. CUMMINS, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That this rule limiting debate shall not apply, except by unanimous consent, to any bill, measure, or question which has been determined upon or agreed to by or in a party caucus or conference of Senators of the majority party.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended to devote some considerable time to the discussion of this matter, because I have been face to face with it in this body for 27 years. The same effort has been made at infrequent intervals to accomplish the results which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has in view. As I suggested a little while ago to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], it was attempted in the days of Henry Clay, in the year 1841, when he thought that debate ought to be limited, but William R. King, a distinguished Senator from Alabama, informed Mr. Clay in a very terse sentence that he had better arrange with his boarding-house keeper to remain all winter if he persisted in his effort, because the plan of Mr. Clay would not succeed, and it did not succeed, and it has not succeeded from that day to this.

I am a member of the Committee on Rules, and have met this old friend—cloture—at various times, but the proposition has never received much consideration. Recently, however, new life has been infused into it from some quarter, and I think I understand whence that influence came. The Committee on Rules reported the resolution favorably at a time when some of us did not know that it was under consideration by the committee. But however that may be it is here, and it is being pressed with great vigor. I am very hopeful that it will not succeed; I have great faith in the Senate when I express that hope, and I think I might say belief, that upon due consideration the action of the Senate on former occasions will be ratified on this occasion, and that we will continue to debate public questions in this forum in the way that we have been doing during the last three-quarters of a century to the great satisfaction of the country, no matter what other Senators may say.

But, Mr. President, if this resolution is to be forced, if this rule is to become a reality, it is barely possible that the words of Macbeth should apply:

> If it were done when 'tis done, then 'twere well
> It were done quickly.

Mr. President, I say that if this is to be done, then it is well that it should be done quickly. I agreed on yesterday to a request for unanimous consent that we vote on this resolution at 4 o'clock this afternoon. If there had been any disposition at all on the part of the opponents of the proposed rule to defeat it by a filibuster we could have kept it before the Senate for days and weeks, but we had no such intention, and we are prepared for the vote, which I believe will be against the proposed rule.

I want to repeat, Mr. President, that notwithstanding the earnestness and the ability that has been called forth in support of this rule, I entertain the hope and belief that when the vote is taken the rule will be rejected, and we will go along as we have been going along, so pleasantly and so successfully in the past.

Why, Mr. President, I have already stated that during the present Congress there has been no attempt by any Senator on either side of the Chamber to prolong debate for the purpose of preventing the prompt passage of any bill. All of the great revenue bills have been passed without delay, all of the so-called war bills that have come to us from the House of Representatives, or that have been originated in this body, have been passed after a reasonable degree of debate. Every appropriation bill that has come from the House of Representatives has been passed except one, and that probably will be passed to-morrow. There is nothing before us that indicates that we have been at all derelict in our duties or lax in the consideration of these measures that are of such vital concern to the country. For that reason I feel sure that the country will not be misled, and I feel reasonably sure that the Senate will not be misled, into the belief that there is any real need for the rule that is being invoked by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, we already have a rule on this subject that was agreed to a little while ago. I agreed to it as a compromise measure, as a member of the committee; and it was then stated to us that if that rule was agreed to we would not be disturbed by changing rules, certainly not in the near future. That rule is a cloture rule. It has answered its purpose. It will continue to answer its purpose if we allow it to remain in our code of rules and do not undertake to pass any other rules relating to that matter. The present proposed rule is not a cloture rule. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] says he would not agree to a cloture rule; but, nevertheless, it is a rule that will disturb Senators, that will be of more vexation than a cloture rule possibly could be; and I want to call attention to that rule.

First, I will ask that the rule that we have in our code and the proposed rule be placed in juxtaposition in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Present rule.]

If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the presiding officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the presiding officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by a yea-and-nay vote the question: "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?" And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy and appeals from the decision of the presiding officer, shall be decided without debate. (S. Res. 5, 65th Cong., special session.)

[Proposed new rule.]

Resolved, That during the period of the present war the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"That no Member shall occupy more than one hour [proposed to be changed to '1 hour and 30 minutes'] in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution and not over 20 minutes on each amendment proposed thereto."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I believe that changing the rule as proposed will be of great disadvantage to the minority of this body. I do not say the present minority. Majorities come, and majorities go; minorities come, and minorities go. I recall the time when the Republicans had a two-thirds majority in this body. I remember the time, not so long afterwards, when the Democrats had a majority of 16, and they now have a majority of but 8, and I think that after the elections in next November it will be well for them if they are not themselves in the minority, in which event they may need the protection which the rules of the Senate have always afforded to the minority.

Let us take the proposed rule. What does it say? That a Senator may speak one hour and a half. How will that operate? A great question is before the Senate, and a Senator speaks for 10 minutes on it, and then takes his seat. Does that foreclose him from speaking any more on that subject? If it does not, and under this rule it manifestly does not, then a short time afterwards he may speak for 5 minutes, and then again for 5 minutes, and again for 10 minutes, and we will need a tally clerk to keep track of our debates, and we will need a blackboard, after the fashion of the baseball field, to record the time record of various Senators.

I do not believe in it. I believe it will be a vexatious method of conducting the business of the Senate. I believe it will be a wrong, not only to the minority but to the majority as well, and how on earth it is really going to limit debate, except to annoy Senators in the presentation of public questions, surpasses my comprehension.

We are entitled to an hour and a half on a bill. We are entitled to 20 minutes on an amendment. Mr. President, there is not an important measure that comes before the Senate to which I can not formulate over 100 amendments, and speak to each one of them, under the proposed rule for 20 minutes, if I want to protract the debate or prevent the passage of legislation.

Mr. President, I believe it will be a sad day for us when we adopt any such system in this body. It is not patterned after the House, which has a cloture rule. On the contrary, it is so much worse than the cloture of any body of which I have any knowledge that has cloture that I trust most seriously and honestly that the Senate will see to it that we are not to be annoyed in this way in our discussions, but that we will go along in the way we have been going along, passing bills largely by unanimous consent, offering no opposition to measures that ought to receive our consideration, but holding in view all the time the fact that the time may come when this body—the minority or the majority of this body, it may be—will feel that to be bound by a rule of that kind is an injustice to their individual States, is an injustice to the people of the United States, and is a degradation to the Senate of which we are all so proud.

Mr. President, I trust that the proposed rule, when it is voted on, may be rejected by the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have always been opposed to the cloture rule of the House of Representatives, because it prevents reasonable debate, but I have also been opposed to unlimited debate in the Senate. There is a compromise between these two extremes that it seems to me it is wise to adopt; and here is a resolution which comes as near as foresight and wisdom can dictate for the adoption of a rule which will give fair discussion, and at the same time will not prolong debate to such an unlimited extent as will prevent the consideration of measures that should come before the Senate.

Mr. President, what is the object of any debate? It is to make effective arguments upon both sides of the question so that Senators can come to an intelligent conclusion. By reason of the fact that we have had unlimited debate in the Senate, a condition has resulted by which we do not have that effective debate, because we do not get Senators to remain in their seats when the long speeches are made.

You have heard and I have heard any number of eloquent speeches, magnificent speeches delivered in this Chamber and yet the number of Senators who were in attendance was limited sometimes to four, five, six, or seven. Why, Mr. President, that happened to-day. During the speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—a masterly speech—there was unquestionably a sad lack of attendance. It is usually caused by the fact that we do know how long a Senator is going to speak, and we do not want to sit and hear a two or three or four or five hours' speech.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator. I have only 10 minutes, though.

Mr. REED. Oh, I did not know that. I will not interrupt the Senator, then, except to call attention to the fact that under the 10-minute rule we have about 15 Senators present now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but usually you will find that the 10-minute rule produces a large attendance. It has done so on almost every occasion. It may be that the Senators are out at lunch now, and therefore there is not a great attendance; but as a matter of fact under a rule providing for short speeches there is usually a good attendance in the Senate, especially when no time is fixed for the taking of the vote. Ordinarily the longer the speech the less is the attendance. Under a filibuster at an all-night session I have witnessed the attendance was the presiding officer, the speaker, a Senator to relieve him if he should get ill, and one Senator in favor of the bill, whose duty was to remain on guard to suggest the absence of a quorum if necessary.

Mr. President, our debates in the Senate are not ordinarily effective, and, in my judgment, it is due to the fact that men will not sit in the Senate Chamber and listen to speeches for two or three hours. Unlimited debate absolutely destroys the very object of allowing time for debate. It does the very thing we want to avoid, and that is it creates a condition where no attention whatever is given to the discussion.

The right to filibuster causes the proponents of many meritorious bills to cease pressing them for passage when they find that a few Senators are determined to prevent a vote on the measures. No one wants to waste his time in futile attempts.

There is not enough time to consider all the measures introduced under unlimited debate.

Mr. President, there is another time when debate of an unlimited nature destroys discussion on one side. You have noticed many a time in this Chamber where the proponents of a measure, thinking they could put the bill through without question, concluded that their policy should be not to debate it; not to answer arguments or ask questions, as it would bring on prolonged replies by the opposition. As long as you have unlimited debate you will not bring out the best arguments in favor of the measure. We know that conditions arise from the fact that they want the debate to close, and to a large extent that is the reason why the seats become empty.

I believe that the rule in vogue in the House of Representatives is equally obnoxious, because it does not give time for that consideration which is proper and wise. It stifles debate, not by the same process, but its effects are the same, namely, that the measure is not given the careful consideration that it should have. But when you have a rule limiting speeches to an hour and a half that condition will not prevail; and I believe the attendance of the Senate would be much better and the arguments be more concise, clear, and convincing. Of course, some men take a long time to present their views, which always sacrifices conciseness for circumlocution and repetition; but when you permit a speech longer than an hour or an hour and a half you are apt to get the Senators who are listening to it worn out and it will not make the desired impression upon them.

It is true that there are a few illustrations that might be cited where great speeches have been long, but they are very exceptional.

Mr. President, believing that we would have a more effective debate, believing that both sides of the controversy would be presented more clearly and more intelligently, and that more Senators would be present to hear the arguments that are made, I believe that a limitation of debate is wise—wise for the consideration of the measure and wise for the proper determination of the same. You can not have an effective debate when people are not present.

But, Mr. President, deeper than the question of the discussion is another question, and that is whether the minority has the right to prevent the enactment of legislation. Not in every instance will a minority attempt to do that. I do not mean a political minority. A smaller number of Senators under the rule of unlimited debate can prevent the passage and consideration here of the measures which the majority want to determine. Under our present rules I have no doubt that as many as five or six men can, if they desire to do so, absolutely prevent the consideration of a measure that the majority want to have enacted; and not only that, but in the short sessions, when we are required by law to adjourn on the 4th day of March, it is well known that two or three Senators determined to defeat a measure can do so.

The obstructive debate under those circumstances is not always made on the measure itself. It is often made on what may be termed a bumper measure, a measure that comes up in advance, and the Senator desires to express his views at large upon it, not so much for the purpose of determining the question involved in that particular instance, but for the purpose of consuming time, thereby preventing the Senate from considering a measure to which he is violently opposed. Now, that is not right. It may be that in some instances a Senator may be excused for delaying the passage of a measure by which his State would be adversely affected, or where he believed his rights are violated; yet this is a government of majorities. We have to determine these questions ultimately; and there is one thing that has always impressed me as having been the object and purpose of a person in opposing measures in this way.

One of the reasons is that they can not get the measure repealed. After the experiment is made, and it is found to be a failure, then the person who has predicted that it would be a failure can not get the statute repealed, because there will be some few Senators interested the other way, and who would most violently oppose its repeal. It is that condition to a large extent, in my judgment, that prevents a Senator from permitting the enactment of the legislation, even when he knows that there is a large majority in its favor. He fights the measure in the hope and expectation that he can wear it out. He fights it in the hope that some measure will come up that will consume time, and that the session will end before the measure to which he is opposed is finally reached. The one reason why that is so, I submit, is because he knows that, under the rules of the Senate, once a statute is placed upon the statute books, it takes almost a unanimous vote ever to repeal it.

Mr. President, it is true there are great questions coming up for consideration before the United States Senate. The question which was referred to by the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday in a very eloquent speech is one of them, and that was with relation to the transmission to the Executive of power that has been vested in the legislative branch of the Government—that is, whether we are going to have autocratic or democratic government. Why, Mr. President, of course that is an important question; but those principles are safeguarded by less than a majority vote. The Constitution stands in the way of such changes. You can not get this transmission of power from the legislative to the executive branch of the Government without a constitutional amendment, and it requires two-thirds of the Members of each body to pass a resolution of that kind. Not only that, but ratification is required by three-fourths of the States. So that the question, though important, and one that should be debated for a reasonable time, is not in danger. Those fundamental questions are safeguarded by the Constitution; and then, in addition to that, you will find that every bill granting power since the war has started contains a clause that the provisions of the bill are limited to the duration of the war, and, without any legislation whatever, those powers considered by some to be so dangerous become absolutely void by the expiration of time.

On that account, Mr. President, it seems to me that, while these questions are important, I do not believe you can have as good a discussion, as argumentative a discussion, as conclusive a discussion, by reason of unlimited debate, as you can by limiting the debate to a reasonable length of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator please pardon the Chair? The Senator's time has just expired.

Mr. GRONNA obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. REED. I withdraw the suggestion, then. It would come out of the Senator's time, and I have no right to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not come out of the Senator's time; but the Senator withdraws the suggestion?

Mr. REED. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had intended to take some time to discuss this resolution; but on yesterday, when the distinguished chairman of this committee asked for a unanimous-consent agreement, I did not feel like opposing it.

A great deal has been said against the resolution, and it is not necessary for me to elaborate any further on that. It has been stated, however, that in the past when filibusters have been conducted on the floor of the Senate some good has come out of them. There is only one occasion that no one seems to have referred to or seems to have justified, and, while I have not the time to go into that to-day, I perhaps shall do so in the future. I had intended to go into it, but I only wish to read from President Wilson's message of February 26, 1917, a short paragraph.

On that occasion the President came to the Senate and asked for legislation empowering him to arm merchant ships. Now, this is what the President says:

> I feel that I ought, in view of that fact, to obtain from you full and immediate assurance of the authority which I may need at any moment to exercise. No doubt I already possess that authority without special warrant of law by the plain implication of my constitutional duties and powers, but I prefer in the present circumstances not to act upon general implication.

Then, again, on April 2, 1917, in his message to Congress, he states:

> When I addressed the Congress on the 26th of February last I thought that it would suffice to assert our neutral rights with arms, our right to use the seas against unlawful interference, our right to keep our people safe against unlawful violence. But armed neutrality, it now appears, is impracticable.

Mr. President, it is certain that in the future, if this proposed rule shall be adopted, every Member who intends to speak in this body, whether he is able to speak without notes or not, will have to write his remarks in order to be able within the limitation of his time to reach the points upon the subject which he intends to speak.

It is always with great reluctance that I interpose objections to any measure coming from the majority side, especially during the period of the war. And were it not for the fact that I am acting in the capacity of a representative from a great sovereign State, I should be perfectly satisfied to have any rule applied placing a limitation upon my time to speak. I do not propose to speak for anyone but myself, but I have always felt that ever since I became a Member of Congress I was acting in the capacity of a representative. I have always felt that responsibilities as well as honors are placed upon every person who acts in the capacity of a representative of the people of any sovereign State.

Nearly every Member of this body who has spoken upon this resolution has admitted that this proposed rule is wholly unnecessary, and it has been conclusively shown by those who are opposed to the measure that there is no necessity, in fact, for its adoption; nor is it true that any important war measure has been delayed in this body due to protracted debate. This being admitted by both the proponents and opponents to be true, one will necessarily ask the question, "Why this rule?"

In my judgment this rule is an insidious effort to throttle free speech in the Senate. It is an effort to shackle the membership of this body; it is the forerunner of boss rule; it is the keystone to the foundation of a political machine. It matters not what time is allotted to any Member, the rule in itself is autocratic; it is despotic; it is contrary to democratic principles of a free government.

Every Senator who is at all familiar with our rules knows that under Senate resolution 5, of the Sixty-fifth Congress, special session, debate can be brought to a close within a very short time if any Member shall abuse the privileges of the Senate.

I have been patiently waiting for some Member of this body to call the attention of the Senate to the rules of the legislative bodies of other nations. But not a single reference, so far as I am aware, upon the debate of this resolution, has been made to the oft-repeated statement that every other legislative body in the world has a cloture rule. And while it is true that in many of the European and other civilized countries there does exist rules which enable the legislative body to control itself and place a limitation upon the time consumed in the disposition of a certain bill, yet I fail to find in any of the European countries a drastic rule like this—allotting specific time to every Member of the legislative bodies.

In 13 of the established lower houses of parliament on the Continent of Europe, in only 3 of those does plain cloture even by a bare majority vote exist. In most instances it takes a three-fourths vote to put the cloture into effect. In many of the European countries, such as Portugal, Sweden, Norway, Spain, and even Hungary, no cloture exists at all, and in free Switzerland there is no cloture only by a two-thirds majority. In the remaining continental States—in France, Holland, Italy, and even the much hated Austria—there is power of cloture, but only after exhaustive debate; and in 10 out of the 13 lower houses of parliament on the Continent of Europe it takes a two-thirds vote to make the rule of cloture effective.

If we examine the rules of the various nations of Europe, we will find that on that Continent only 7 out of 13 assemblies agree to any form whatever of cloture by a bare majority.

If any rule is necessary for the conduct of the business of this body, it would be one to request the attendance of every Senator whenever an important measure is before the Senate. In Canada there is such a rule in force, but no such arbitrary rule as this proposed rule exists in the Parliament of Canada or in the House of Commons of England, and I might say in any of the civilized nations of Europe.

I sometimes think that we underestimate the intelligence of the constituencies we represent. I sometimes think that we forget that whatever mistakes we make here are made at the expense of those whom we are sent here to represent.

Why place a limitation upon debate in this body at a time when every loyal American citizen is sacrificing his blood or his treasure, and for what? For a continuation of American freedom as instituted by the fathers, and for an extension of it to foreign lands.

I do not believe that the tremendous sacrifices made at this time are made to place a limitation upon American liberty. It is not a question of how many bills we pass in this body; it is a question of what kind of laws we enact. It is a question as to whether or not we are responsive to the will of the people we represent. I do not believe that the action of the majority in this instance will be indorsed by the American people. This rule is not necessary in order to transact the business of the Senate, and if used at all it will be to the interest of a political machine—to the interest of bossism and autocracy.

Here in free America we will not tolerate a Marat or a Robespierre, and certainly our people will not sanction the rule of an oligarch, be his title king or kaiser.

No; there is no danger in our land of such an extreme as that, but there is always danger in a republic of transgressing upon the people's rights, and often it is done unconsciously, but the results are the same to the people. The unmasked foe is not nearly as dangerous as the wolf which poses in sheep's clothing. History reveals to us that the deadliest work has often been done in the name of liberty. We need only go back a century and a quarter and learn from the annals of history of civilized nations of that day how people's lives were snuffed out under the pretense of loyalty and liberty, but without any cause or justification.

I am sure that it is not the intention of anyone, and certainly not of any Member of this body, to go to the extent of adopting rules that would ultimately lead to despotism; but while it is true that no one who has anything to do with the affairs of government would knowingly approve such a plan, yet it is not impossible that unconsciously we may drift into the habit of wanting to transact this vast and important business of the Government with too much haste. We may be intrenching upon the most fundamental principle of our Government without any thought of doing so, and certainly without any motive or intention of doing so.

To take from one of the coordinate branches of our Government either the freedom or the responsibility bestowed upon it by the fathers is of vital concern, not alone to its Members but to the people they represent. I know that in free America a dictatorship can not be established, and if established it would not long endure, because it would not be approved by the American people.

It is true that the people of every nation that has experienced the ruthless rule of autocracy have first discovered the poisonous fangs of the enemy of human liberty in the form of having restrictions placed upon the freedom of the press and free speech.

As to our duty to the President, regardless of political affiliations, we all honor and respect the President, the Chief Executive of our land; loyal Americans have always done so, regardless of who has been President. But our duties and our responsibilities as citizens consist of more than saying we honor and respect the President. It is our duty, as well as it is the duty of the President, to do the right thing, not only to win the war, but to leave the affairs of the Government in such condition that when the war is over the burdens, as well as the benefits, shall be so distributed that the people will be able to bear them.

APPENDIX.

CLOTURE FOR THE ENGLISH HOUSE OF COMMONS.

When we find that an autumn session has been called for the express purpose of considering reform in the procedure of the House of Commons, we are forced to admit that urgency has been proved for such reform.

And, more than this, we are forced to admit that the details of such reform are still matter for debate. There has, indeed, been a noteworthy seesawing of rumors and reports as to Mr. Gladstone's intentions in regard to the now notorious first resolution. But inasmuch as we are told that this first resolution, or its equivalent, is as it were the hinge on which hangs the whole proposed reform, I am assured it will be useful to remind public opinion of the real issues involved.

I wish briefly to inquire whether it is not true that this first resolution, as at present worded, is (1) un-English, (2) unparliamentary, (3) self-destructive, (4) useless, and (5) unnecessary, in the sense that there is an alternative which will achieve all the good and do none of the evil contemplated or dreaded of this first resolution.

1.—Is it not un-English?

Mr. Gladstone, in introducing this resolution, put forward as a main and chief argument in favor of cloture by a bare majority, that it was a principle that had been adopted by most other legislative assemblies; and he founded his appeal most especially on the practice of our colonies, "in which," said he most truly, "the British character is reflected, and which value British freedom not less than we value it."

Premises formulated on such high authority at once become current coin. We find them, for instance, in the circular issued on the cloture by the National Liberal Federation (p. 3):

"Q. But is it not un-English and only adopted by foreigners?

"A. That is a mistake. The English in our colonies, and the Americans of the United States, have found it indispensable."

And yet these premises, originating with the premier, and disseminated far and wide under the indorsement of the chief liberal organization, are distinctly and directly at variance with actual fact.

This was partially pointed out to Mr. Gladstone at the first, and he took prompt occasion to modify his sweeping assertion. "He was sorry to say he had made a mistake, owing to his infirmity of sight having prevented him from clearly reading his notes. He believed that a closing power existed in the legislative assemblies of the Cape, South Australia, and Victoria, but not in those of Canada, Tasmania, or New Zealand." This statement was made on February 21, 1881, in the House of Commons. On the previous 8th of December, 1880, Government had received a special dispatch from the Cape, stating that "the rules of practice of the House of Assembly, being substantially the same as those of the House of Commons, there is no authorized mode of procedure for directing interfering with the freedom of debate or for abridging or determinating a discussion by cloture." And on February 2, 1881, Government had received a special dispatch from the speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, stating that the cloture had been adopted as a standing order continued to the session of 1775–76, but that "no standing order having a similar object has since been adopted by the assembly." Mr. Gladstone will be the first to regret that he did not avail himself of official dispatches so essential to the correct statement of his case.

As a matter of fact, only one out of all our colonies has in its legislative assembly any cloture rule whatever. This single colony is the Providence of South Australia, containing under 250,000 English people, as opposed to the 7,000,000 resident in the other colonies enjoying self-government of the parliamentary type. And this particular rule was entered on the "paper" constitution at its first inception. There was at the time no experience to go by, either in that or in any other English colony. The attempt was a mere experiment.

The Liberal Federation adds to the clause above quoted: "The cloture, like the ballot and universal suffrage, is none the worse for having been proved a success abroad before being tried at home." This nobody will deny. But the converse is equally undeniable. "The cloture is all the worse for having proved a failure abroad." It will probably be significant news to Mr. Gladstone and to the Liberal Federation to learn that in two of our colonies—in Victoria and in New Zealand—the cloture has been deliberately tried and deliberately discarded. In the years 1876 and 1863, respectively, the cloture was proved a failure in those two colonies.

And there is another vital point in the case of which no one seems to have taken any notice. The lower your franchise the more is the chance that some men, at all events, obtain seats in the legislative assembly who have antecedents or qualities little calculated to promote decency in debate, respect for the wishes of others, or a proper spirit of deference to the general will. This is not a matter of theory but of recorded results. And again, this chance, if we look to experience, is considerably widened if, besides a low franchise for electors, the members themselves all receive pay. I have myself listened to debates in our various colonial assemblies, and I believe all who have done likewise will concur in saying that the few really unruly members are types of men who would find it difficult to obtain and retain a seat but for the concurrent existence of manhood suffrage and payment of members. These two conditions no doubt have their good points, but they also have their bad—and the chief of these bad points is the fact that they, at all events, open the doors of an assembly to a disturbing and an obstructing element.

This element is a new element in English parliamentary life, and it is a very noteworthy fact that in our various self-governing colonies—where the qualifications for electors is either manhood suffrage or a very slight property qualification, and in three of which there exists payment of members—so strong is the old English parliamentary instinct that in only one of their legislative assemblies does any form of cloture exist, and that in two others it has been, as I have said, deliberately tried and deliberately discarded.

I do not think more need be said to show that it is only by ignoring facts that we can for a moment contend that Englishmen have shown themselves partial to parliamentary cloture by a bare majority. Is the House of Commons, the proud mother of a numerous colonial offspring, to declare herself incapable of that self-restraint which her colonial offspring still retain, and which is, indeed, the very essence of parliamentary procedure? Is the House of Commons to impose upon itself a restraint which all experience and all facts loudly proclaim to be thoroughly un-English in principle and in practice?

2.—Is it not unparliamentary?

We are told we should have cloture by a bare majority, because the legislative assemblies in the United States and on the Continent of Europe have it.

a. It certainly does exist in the United States. But here again we have the fundamental difference that there is manhood suffrage for the electors, and £1,000 per annum for every member. The result is one of the first lessons learned in a sojourn in the United States, viz, the respective estimations in which an American Representative and an English "M. P." are held. Further comment is needless.

b. And then as to the Continent of Europe. We are told: "Surely if all continental assemblies find such a rule necessary, we should not hesitate in England." Was there ever a more flagrant case of petitio principii? There are 13 established "lower houses of parliament" on the Continent, and in only 3 of these does plain cloture by a bare majority exist. Among continental "lower houses" there is a majority of three-fourths against cloture of this type. And even in these three minority cases—in Belgium, Denmark, and Germany—there is either manhood suffrage or payment of members, or both. In five of the remaining continental assemblies—those of Hungary, Portugal, Sweden, Norway, and Spain—no form of cloture whatever has been adopted. In free Switzerland there is cloture only by a two-thirds majority. In the remaining continental States—in France, Holland, Italy, and Austria—there is power of cloture, but only after further debate. Mr.

Gladstone's first resolution is contrary to the practice of 10 out of the 13 lower houses of parliament on the Continent of Europe.

Even if we allow the latitude of further debate, we shall find that on the Continent only 7 out of the 13 assemblies agree to any form whatever of cloture by a bare majority; and yet of these continental States many have manhood suffrage and many pay their members. In a word, the experience of American and European legislative assemblies is altogether against cloture by a bare majority, unless there exist also manhood suffrage and payment of members. And in many cases even where these exist it has not yet been found necessary to institute cloture. The first resolution, as put forward by Mr. Gladstone, is adopted in practice in 4 only of the 14 foreign assemblies of established reputation that have been put forward in evidence. It would thus appear that it is unparliamentary even in foreign experience.

c. But if it is contrary to the general spirit of parliamentary government abroad, it is more particularly at variance with that particular form of parliamentary government which prevails in England. The House of Commons has not yet abdicated its traditional position and functions as a portion of the English Parliament that it is not a mere legislative machine, not a mere manufactory of acts of Parliament, but actually one of the great centers of the political life of the nation. One of the chief of these functions is that of guardian of the national purse; and the House of Commons shares, as a parliamentary chamber, in the grave and great duty of the redress of grievances: it has been truly styled the "grand inquest of the nation." And in these respects there is a cardinal difference between it and many of the lower chambers of other countries. And this is a cogent, unanswerable reason why the power to close discussion peremptorily should not be placed in the hands of a bare majority. Such a power is distinctly antagonistic to the uses to which Parliament is put in England.

3.—Is it not self-destructive?

The Liberal Federation, in its circular on the question, utterly condemns the first resolution when it says: "A rule giving a majority absolute control over debate when it exceeds 200 and no power at all when it falls below that figure, unless the minority numbers less than 40, is illogical and indefensible." Mr. Gladstone himself explicitly prefers "a bare majority as opposed to an artificial majority constructed in ingenious ways." And yet the House of Commons is asked to pass a rule which is hopelessly ingenious and artificial.

b. The self-contradictory nature of the proposal stands revealed in the asking the "evident sense of the house" to declare itself by a bare majority of one. If the evident sense of the house, why this stickling for a bare majority of one? The thing is a mere contradiction in terms.

c. Or again: On February 20 the premier exclaimed, "God forbid that we should see so vast an innovation introduced into the practice of the house, as would be a rule of the house, under which the voice of the majority was not to prevail over that of the minority." Heaven forbid, by all means! But, then, is there not just a suspicion of something contradictory of this principle in a rule which enacts that, if a hundred members wish to stop a debate, and even 5 members, or, for the matter of that, only 1 member, object to this "evident sense of the house," the voice of the majority of 100 is powerless to prevail over that of a minority of 1?

d. Or again: We are told the principle must be that of a bare majority, and that ingenious artificial majorities are not permissible. This principle is immediately discarded so soon as the majority is reduced to the magic number 200. Then the new ingenious and artificial majority of at least four-fifths comes into play; and this new principle is in its turn thrown overboard directly the majority falls to another magic number—100. Then the principle is adopted that no majority whatever can stop a debate. Surely the force of self-destructive contradiction can no further go. It comes to this: In a full house one man can stop a debate, and in a thin house one man can prevent a debate being stopped.

e. These latter objections have been summarily ruled out of court by the despotic rejoinder "we must protect small minorities with whom all great reforms begin, and big minorities can take care of themselves." This may be very true, but it is not obvious how a big minority is to take care of itself when a bare majority rules; nor is it quite obvious why a majority should have no power whatever against a minority, provided that minority be small and insignificant; neither is it obvious how a small minority can be said to be protected when the greater majority against it the more certain is its utter quashing.

We remember there are two significations to the word "gag." This first resolution imposes the silencing gag on big minorities but allows full license of theatrical gag to minute minorities. It may be true that it is "with small minorities that great reforms originate." Yet few will be fanatical enough to assert that the views of all small minorities are necessarily the germs of great reforms. They may be all germs of something, but many of them are germs destined to dry up and rot of inanition or innate corruption. Why burden the overtasked time of Parliament with listening to speeches, every one of them germs, on the bare chance that one or the other may eventually issue in a great reform? All this is directly contrary to the true spirit of the age. We are hoping that political knowledge is spreading far and fast; we are looking to see reforms commend themselves to the great body of public opinion long before they trouble the overtaxed judgment of Parliament. These germs must be sifted and sorted and tried in the fire of outside public opinion, and then, and then only, should they enter into the charge of parliamentary discussion.

f. The tissue of self-destructive argument is carried to its climax when we are told "a bare majority rules in legislation; then, why not in debate?" If we adopt this principle, what becomes of the idea of the small minority? It is Aristotle's old complaint again. People will discuss the * * * before they have so much as asked * * *. As a matter of fact, a bare majority only rules in legislation subject to appeal to the country. No ministry would remain in power which by some chance parliamentary majority forced measures through that were objected to by the constituencies. Legislation is not final and irrevocable; stopping debate is both the one and the other. It destroys the occasion once and for all. The regulation of debate is, as it were, a private and not a public duty of the House of Commons. Debate is fundamentally different from legislation. And that is why, even in this first resolution itself, the principle of the bare majority is very speedily discarded.

4.—Is it not useless?

a. Mr. Gladstone has wisely told us that "to adopt an ineffective measure would be to aggravate the evil." Would this first resolution be effective? The evil to be overcome is obstruction. If we take the trouble to look up the figures of all the bad cases of obstruction in recent sessions, we see at once that they seldom or never occur in houses that could gather a majority of 200 in favor of closing a debate, and that they very frequently occur—and these the worst instances of outrageously protracted debate—when it would be even impracticable to gather together a majority of 100 members. In other words, of the serious cases of obstruction that have called for some remedy the milder cases under the new rule would require a four-fifths majority, and in the more severe cases the new rule would be absolutely powerless to prevent obstruction. It would, indeed, in some cases, positively legalize obstruction of the very worst type. The new rule enacts that the more a minority falls off in comparative importance—the more; that is, that it leaves opposition and approaches obstruction—the greater its power to prevent the closing of a debate. In other words, the measure suggested is obviously ineffective and useless to achieve the purpose for which it is intended and, in Mr. Gladstone's words, it will therefore only "aggravate the evil."

b. A curious point is that the scheme of a bare majority has been virtually declared useless by Her Majesty's Government. We have been told that the bare majority will never be needed in actual practice; firstly, because of the temper of the house; and, secondly, because such "objectionable" use would be a direct breach in principle and in practice of the evident sense of the house. Mr. Bright's speech was only one of many that dealt with the rule in this spirit. We are told, in short, that decision by a majority of one is impossible in the face of the surrounding conditions. Consequently, such a rule will be useless.

Recently the opposition has been severely taken to task for forcing into the hands of Government powers to be used in Ireland beyond those the Government considered necessary. Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues, not without reason, expressed much virtuous indignation at being clothed with powers they considered they did not need. And yet Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues press the House of Commons not only to clothe itself with, but to bind itself to use, powers which it declares it does not need. And the question remains, Where is the necessity, or indeed the desirability, of a rule which in its rigid severity is out of all proportion not only to the needs but to the possibilities of the case?

c. We are asking, is not this rule useless? We are told the initiative is explicitly with the speaker, "when it shall appear to the speaker to be the evident sense of the house." It is obviously impossible that this can occur when a bare majority of one is necessary. Again, we have this contradiction in terms. If the question is not even to be put unless it is the obvious sense of the house, then a bare majority will never be appealed to; and it is useless to enact that the decision shall be by a bare majority.

5.—Is it not unnecessary?

The evident sense of the house, if duly armed, can always assert itself. And the evident sense of the house is what is known as a sufficient majority of the house.

We have been told to go to the progeny of the House of Commons for any reforms we need. In very many cases, even in the minor progeny of public company and public meetings, "artificial" majorities are much in favor. Alterations in the "constitution acts" of our colonies and conferences between the two houses of the legislature require "two-thirds," "sufficient," and "absolute" majorities. In the United States Congress, as in expelling a Member or overcoming a presidential obstruction, a "two-thirds" majority is required. In Switzerland, as we have seen, a "two-thirds" majority is required in closing a debate.

The practical question remains—we are determined that something new must be done to put down obstruction. All consider it necessary to give some form and substance, some definite embodiment, to the floating principle of the well-known cry "Divide! Divide!" The house, as a whole, is the owner of its own time. It is the house as a whole, and not any party or section of it, that claims to be able to close a debate. The house, as a whole, the evident sense of the house, can only mean a great, absolute, sufficient majority of the house. But to reduce such a principle to practical terms you must define. Make it two-thirds or three-fourths, or what you will, but make it something tangible and definite.

It may be said that if the power to close a debate be given to the "evident sense of the house," ipso facto, for the nonce, the rights of the minority are put out of court. If there be sufficient fear that the parliamentary sense, guaranteed, indeed, against the active despotism of any party or faction, may nevertheless thus be aroused to stifle the wholesome ventilation of views held only by a minority, the rule might be modified on the following lines:

"That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, during any debate and after four or more members have spoken to the (main) question to be the evident sense of the house, or of the committee, that the question be now put, he may so inform the house, and if a motion be made 'that the question be now put,' Mr. Speaker or the Chairman shall forthwith put such questions, etc., provided that the question shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by three-fourths of the members present."

Some such rule is an alternative which would achieve all the good and do none of the evil contemplated or dreaded in the first resolution as it stands worded. But to use a bare majority is to use a weapon altogether unsuited and altogether too drastic for the purpose, for it is certain in the course of time first of all to generate, and last of all to realize in practice, the idea that it is an excellent weapon for the purposes of partisan despotism. And to mix up this principle of a bare majority with ingenious and artificial restrictions is to ask the House of Commons to impose on itself rules of procedure which are at once un-English, unparliamentary, self-destructive, useless, and unnecessary.

GEORGE BADEN-POWELL.

[From Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada. (4th edition.) Chapter XII.]

II. Senate rules respecting committees of the whole: When the senate has been "put into committee" it is recorded in the journals as "adjourned during pleasure," and when the committee rises it is stated that "the house was resumed." (Sen. J. (1883), 86; Ib. (1890), 198; Ib. (1901), 223, 236. The same practice prevails in the Lords, though it is not now usual to make the entry "adjourn during pleasure." 119 Lords, J. 293, etc.) The procedure with respect to committees of the whole is substantially the same in the two houses. The senate has the following special rules on the subject:

"72. When the senate is put into committee every senator is to sit in his place.

"73. The rules of the senate are observed in a committee of the whole except the rules limiting the number of times of speaking, and no motion for the previous question or for an adjournment can be received, but a senator may at any time move that the chairman leave the chair, or report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

"74. No arguments are admitted against the principle of a bill in a committee of the whole.

"75. When the senate is put into a committee of the whole the sitting of the senate is not resumed without the unanimous consent of the committee, unless upon a question put by the senator who shall be in the chair of such committee.

"76. The proceedings of the committee are entered in the journals of the senate."

There is no chairman of committees in the senate regularly appointed at the commencement of every session, as in the House of Lords (109 Lords, J. 11,237 E. Hans. (3), 58), but the speaker will call a member to the chair. In committee a senator may address himself to the rest of the senators.

[From Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure (4th ed.), Ch. X, "Rules of debate."]

VI. Length of speeches: Members are not limited to time when they address the house, except under special circumstances provided for by a rule adopted in 1913. This rule (17B) is one of a series established with a view of limiting debate at a certain period and also closing debate altogether, after previous notice. The notice to bring this rule into effect must be given by a minister of the Crown. He must have given notice of his intention at a previous sitting, and the motion when made is to be decided without debate or amendment. If the motion is carried no member can speak more than once, even in committee, and no longer than 20 minutes, and the debate must automatically close at 2 o'clock a. m. if the debate continues to that hour. Apart from speeches made under this rule, members may address the house at any length. Suggestions have frequently been made in favor of regulations limiting the time of speaking, but they have been found unpractical and inadvisable with the above exception, which is applicable only under peculiar circumstances. The rule referred to will be quoted in full in another reference to debate later on in this chapter. While no limit has been placed on the length of speeches in the Imperial Commons, a debate may be closed by the adoption of the previous question, which is put without debate or amendment. But this motion which is, "That the question be now put" is to a certain extent under the control of the speaker, or chairman, who may decline to put it if he thinks the motion an abuse of the rules of the house, or an infringement on the rights of the minority, or if when a vote is taken it appears that at least 100 members have voted in the majority. Other features of limitations to cloture in the British House of Commons which are not at all applicable in the Canadian Commons are discussed in May, pages 217–226. In the United States House of Representatives there are rules limiting the time of speaking. (Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives. Wilson's Digest of Parliamentary Law, 404.)

VIII. Other limitations of debate—cloture: The Senate rule 35 provides that "no Senator may speak twice to a question before the Senate except in explanation of a material part of his speech, in which he may have been misconceived, and then he is not to introduce new matter." And by the following rule (36), "a reply is allowed to a Senator who has moved the second reading of a bill or made a substantive motion, but not to one who has moved an amendment, the previous question, an adjournment during debate, a motion on the consideration of Commons' amendments, or an instruction to a committee." In all cases the reply of the mover of the original question closes the debate. But it is the duty of the speaker to see that every Senator wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply. (Senate Rule 37.) The rules of the House of Commons are similar on these points. They may be summarized as follows: (1) No member may speak twice to a question; he may, however, explain a material part of his speech which may have been misquoted or misunderstood, but he is not to introduce new matter. (2) No debate is allowable upon such explanation. (3) A reply is allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill. (4) But no reply is allowed to a member who has moved an order of the day—not being the second reading of a bill—an amendment, the previous question, and adjournment during a debate, or an instruction to a committee. (5) A reply is allowed to a mover of a substantive motion, although the debate thereon, by being adjourned, becomes an order of the day. (6) In all cases the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate. (7) But it is the duty of the speaker to see that every member who wishes to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply. (H. C. Rule 21.)

It is the practice in the Canadian House, as in the British Parliament, for the member who makes a motion to give the name of his seconder, who may, if necessary, lift his hat as evidence that he has intimated his consent and under such circumstances he is allowed to speak at a subsequent stage of the debate on the question (May, 321, 322, 210 E. Hans. (3) 304). The same practice prevails in the Senate (S. R. 38). But if a member who moves an order of the day or seconds a motion should rise and say only a word or two—that he moves the order or seconds the motion—he is precluded from again addressing the house according to a strict interpretation of the rules (194 E. Hans. (3) 1479; 4 E. Hans. (N. S.) 1013). In moving an amendment a member is obliged to rise, and though he may only propose his amendment he is considered to have exhausted his right to speak on the question before the house (118 E. Hans. (3) 1147, 1163, May, 322, 323). On the same principle when a member rises and simply reads a substantive motion to the house, he is considered to have spoken to the question, but he may claim the right of reply at a later stage.

A member who has already spoken to a question has no right to rise again and propose an amendment or the adjournment of the house, or of the debate, though he may speak again to those new questions, when they are moved by other members (May, 323, 222 E. Hans. (3) 1120, 237 Ib. 408, 1532. Cushing, pp. 618, 619. Can. Com. J. (1907) 230). For the same reason a member who has moved the adjournment of the debate which has been negatived can not speak to the original question. A member who has moved or seconded the adjournment of a debate can not afterwards rise to move the adjournment of the house. And, as a member who moves an amendment can not speak again, so a member who speaks in seconding an amendment is equally unable to speak again on the original question, after the amendment has been withdrawn or otherwise disposed of. In both cases the members have already spoken while the question was before the house and before the amendment had been proposed from the chair (May, 322). But if a member moves an amendment and does not speak, he will be allowed to address himself to the main question by withdrawing the amendment (217 E. Hans. (3) 1405).

It is usual for a member who wishes to have the floor on a future day to move the adjournment of debate, and to give him the priority when it is resumed. The house also frequently agrees to adjourn the debate in order to allow an opportunity to a member to continue his speech on a future occasion (Can. Hans. Apr. 7, 1877 (Mr. Costigan) 1266–7. 13 E. Hans. (1) 114. 194 Ib. (3) 1470. 196 Ib. 1265). But a member must rise in his place when the house resumes the debate, otherwise he will forfeit his privilege (126 E. Hans. (3) 1246). If a member should move the adjournment of debate, and the house should negative that motion, he will have exhausted his right of speaking on the main question. When a debate is adjourned until a future day, a member who has previously spoken on the subject has no right to speak again, unless a new question has been proposed in the shape of an amendment (194 E. Hans. (3) 1470. 196 Ib. 1265, 222 Ib. 1341, Can. Hans. (1878), 1976. May, 322). In committee of the whole house the restriction upon speaking more than once is removed. When a member speaks to order he must simply direct attention to the point raised and submit it to the decision of the speaker (May, 323).

Previously to the coming into force of the new rules of 1913, already alluded to, a debate upon the motion for the speaker to leave the chair in order that the house resolve itself into committee of supply or of ways and means, was always in order and is still in order whenever a motion to that effect is necessary. But it is now provided by rule 17C that on Thursdays and Fridays, when the order of the day is called to go into either of those committees, the speaker leaves the chair without putting any question. But it is provided that the estimates for each department shall first be taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday. This provision, however, may be waived by the consent of the house.

Closure of debate in the House of Commons is effected under the provision of Rule 17B. This rule was adopted on the 23d of April, 1913, after a debate of considerable length and unusual warmth, but marked by great ability and parliamentary learning on the part of the members taking part in the discussion. (Can. Hans. (April, 1913), pp. 7588–8456. Can. Com. J. (1913), pp. 451–453.)

The rule is as follows: "Immediately before the order of the day for resuming an adjourned debate is called, or if the house be in committee of the whole, or supply, or of ways and means, any minister of the Crown who standing in his place shall have given notice at a previous sitting of his intention so to do, may move that the debate shall not be further adjourned, or that the further consideration of any resolution or resolutions, clause or clauses, section or sections, preamble or preambles, title or titles, shall be the first business of the committee and shall not further be postponed, and in either case such question shall be decided without debate or amendment; and if the same shall be resolved in the affirmative no member shall thereafter speak more than once, or longer that 20 minutes in any such adjourned debate; or if in committee, on any such resolution, clause, section, preamble, or title; and if such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall not have been resumed or concluded before 2 o'clock in the morning, no member shall rise to speak after that hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to conclude such adjourned debate or postponed consideration shall be decided forthwith."

The rule is so clear that little comment is necessary. It will be noted that the notice of the motion for closing a debate must be given by a minister of the Crown, thus making the government of the day responsible for the proposed action, and that the motion must be postponed until the following sitting of the house. The first occasion on which debate was closed under the above rule was on May 9, 1913. The prime minister (Rt. Hon. R. L. Borden) having given the required notice at the close of the sitting on May 8, in the committee of the whole on the naval-aid bill, when the committee resumed on May 9 the premier moved that the further consideration of the second, third, fourth, and fifth section and proposed sixth section of the bill shall be the first business of the committee and shall not be further postponed. The motion was carried in committee by a vote of 71 to 44, and thereafter until the bill was reported with an amendment speeches of 20 minutes in length only were in order. Can. Hans. (1913), Vol. V, pp. 9444–9445. Some procedure of "closure debate" is in force in most of the legislative bodies of the world, notably Great Britain, Italy, France, Germany, Netherlands, Portugal, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, Switzerland, and the United States (House of Representatives). There is no method of closure of debate in the United States Senate or in the Japanese Diet, in the Hungarian Parliament, or in Sweden or Norway. The methods vary widely. In England any member may move that "the question be now put." This question must be put forthwith without amendment or debate unless the speaker or chairman rules that the motion is an abuse of the rules or an infringement upon the rights of the minority. The motion is not carried unless, in cases of a division, at least 100 members vote in the majority for the motion. It thus appears that the closure motion must be sanctioned by the chair. In France the president of the chamber puts the question of closure without a motion in case there is a general call for "la cloture." Only one member can speak against the proposal, and none in its favor. The question is then put by the president, "Shall the debate be closed?" and if it is resolved in the affirmative the debate is closed and the main motion is at once put. In the House of Representatives at Washington the closure is effected by the moving of the previous question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is quite evident that the debate on the pending amendment of the Senator from New Mexico will continue until all debate closes, so that it is going to be impossible to offer any amendment and debate it. I have an amendment, but it is not in order now, which I expect to offer when the present amendment is disposed of and the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is also disposed of. I want to avail myself of an opportunity of talking about that amendment now for a few moments.

When the proper parliamentary situation shall have been reached, I am going to offer an amendment to strike out of the original resolution the following words, found in line 18, page 2, to wit:

During the period of the present war.

The resolution now pending, whether the amendments pending are agreed to or not, will provide that this rule shall cease when the war is over. It is offered by its sponsors purely as a war proposition.

Mr. President, if there is any reason for any kind of a cloture rule in the Senate, and I have always been one who has advocated that there was, that rule is more necessary in time of peace than in war. If there is any time when there should be no cloture it is during the war, in my judgment. I have not heard a single argument, and I have listened to most of the debate, that is in any wise convincing why this rule should be confined to the war period. If the proposed rule is a good one, then it ought to be adopted as a permanent rule of the Senate, without regard to the existence of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator for a question. My time is limited, as I hope the Senator will remember.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that those words were put in in order to secure enough Democratic votes to pass the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not aware as to why they were put in; but, Mr. President, regardless of why they were put in, there is no reason, in my judgment, for their being put in. There is no argument that can be made in favor of a cloture rule of any kind in the Senate that will apply to the present time which will not apply when peace has been declared. On the other hand, as I said a while ago, there is more reason why there should be complete and unlimited debate while the great question of war is before us than at any other time. If it be true that these words were put in, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggests, in order to get enough Democratic votes to pass the resolution, then of course my amendment will not prevail, because the Democratic majority will refuse to strike out those words.

Mr. President, I have been one who has believed in a reasonable cloture rule in the Senate, not because of war nor because of peace, but from my viewpoint for the more orderly procedure of business in the Senate. More than two years ago I introduced a resolution providing for an amendment of the rules that is in effect the same as this rule will be when the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is agreed to and provided that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is likewise agreed to, and the amendment that I have proposed is also adopted.

It seems to me that we are illustrating now one of the evils of the present Senate rules. We are working under a unanimous-consent agreement that at 4 o'clock all debate shall cease, and the amendment that I propose will be conceded by every honest man to be a material one, an important one, a most vital one, and yet unless I took advantage of the pending amendment to explain it I would never be allowed to say a single word in its support, because the hour for debate to close will come while some other amendment is pending and it will have to be submitted without debate. That illustrates what has happened hundreds of times in the Senate on the most important bills that have ever come before us. It is going to happen almost every time we wind up our debate, as we usually do, by some unanimous-consent agreement. If we do not wind it up by some such agreement, then it comes to a close often by a test of physical endurance. Then those in charge of the bill hold the Senate in session until somebody is worn out, until either those who favor it or those who oppose it are worn out physically, so that they can not stand it any longer and must submit. That is not orderly debate; that is not conducive to intelligent legislation. I have always contended that the minority ought to be protected fully, and there ought to come a time under the rule itself, without any outside agreement, when debate will naturally come to a conclusion.

I think with the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa—and I should like to have these other amendments adopted—this rule, while it is not quite as liberal as I would make it and not quite as liberal as I made it in the rule I proposed, it will give an opportunity for a fair and reasonable debate for as long a time as should be consumed, as a rule. When an important question is under discussion that requires longer time there will not be one time in a thousand, if legitimate debate is going on, but what the Senator having the floor can get by unanimous consent an extension of time under that rule; and if that is denied, it will be in order right then to move to extend his time, and it will be decided without debate and carried by a majority vote. It seems to me that that is a full protection to fair and honest discussion. I believe it is an improvement over the existing condition, although, as I said, if I had my way about it I would make it more liberal than it is made in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. But whatever we may think, whatever we may favor in regard to debate in the Senate, there is no man, in my judgment, who can offer a single argument in favor of or against any rule to close debate or to limit it which exists during war that does not exist every other time and upon every other occasion. It seems to me that those words ought to be stricken out and we ought to make a rule that will be permanent if we make any. There is no reason why one rule of debate should apply when we have war and another rule less liberal when we have peace.

Mr. President, I want to print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a part of the rule that I introduced to which I referred. In fact, the entire rule provided that it should not be enforced unless put in force by a vote of the Senate, and when it went into effect it should apply to that particular question and should not apply to any other question unless it was again put in force. That part of it I want to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to print as an appendix to his remarks the rule referred to. Is there objection? There being none, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than three hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments, and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for three hours in general debate shall, in addition to said 15 minutes, be allowed additional time, but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate three hours: Provided further, That if unanimous consent for additional time is asked in behalf of any Senator, either during general debate or when the bill or resolution is being considered for amendment, and the same is refused, it shall be in order by motion to extend the time of such Senator for a time to be named in said motion, which motion shall be decided without debate. When the bill or resolution is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the discussion indulged in by Senators leads me to believe that the present rules of the Senate are not understood. There is no unlimited debate in the Senate under the rules of the Senate to-day. We have a rule that is much more drastic than the one proposed here. It can be put into force at any time 16 Senators desire it to be put into force. For that reason I have racked my brain to find out why this proposed amendment to the rules has found its way into the Senate at this time.

Let me call attention to the rule we now have governing debate in this body.

If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the presiding officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the presiding officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

"Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"

And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy, and appeals from the decision of the presiding officer, shall be decided without debate. (S. Res. 5, 65th Con., sp. sess.)

Senators, is there any more cloture that you want than this? Yet, Mr. President, in all the days of Congress since the declaration of war, or since the adoption of this amendment to the rules, it has not been called into force one single time. It is not necessary, and I challenge any Senator to say that at any time has there been a semblance of a filibuster upon any question before Congress since the amendment of the rules as provided for in the amendment which I have just read.

Mr. President, we find whenever there is any legislation asked for that is a little doubtful or that Senators having it in charge think there will be a question about, or if the administration feels that it has to be braced up in some way, it is always preceded by these words, "whose operation shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war."

I know the Senator from Alabama is in favor of cloture; he always has been. I know the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is in favor of cloture; he always has been. It is a surprise to me to see a resolution brought in here, agreed to by three Senators who are all in favor of cloture at any time, with the words "during the period of the present war." I know why those words appear in the resolution. It is because if they were not made a part of the resolution it could not pass. There are not enough votes in the Senate to pass it, and the proponents of the resolution know it. They know it and I know it. The object of reporting such a provision is to allow the camel's head to get under the tent, with the hope that in a very short time he will get his whole body in.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I have only three minutes remaining and I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, think of what this means, in connection with the rule we have already adopted, when a revenue measure is before this body. We will have one at this session of Congress by which we expect to levy $8,000,000,000 taxes on the business of the country and the American people. The chairman of the Finance Committee, who will be responsible for the passage of the bill, is supposed, as it is his duty as well as the duty of every member of the Finance Committee, to call the attention of Senators to the vital points and explain what revenue is expected from every agency taxed. He may take the hour and thirty minutes; and I say there is no man living who can cover the thousands of items in an hour and a half. After he has exhausted his hour and a half and some other Senator rises in his seat and contradicts the statement he has made and offers other figures—there is no telling from what source he may have received them—the chairman of the committee must sit in his seat silent and never defend a statement that he has made. I say if we undertake to put that kind of cloture on this body it will be a sorry day for the American people and the effect will be imperfect legislation.

We have been told time and again, even at this session, that a bill should be passed immediately; that it was important. The legislative appropriation bill was passed within one hour because of its importance to carrying on the war. No discussion was considered proper. That bill has been in conference ever since April 16, nearly two months, and there have been but two meetings of the conferees held.

The passage of this resolution means that running debate will be closed in the future, and I say now that there has been more information given to Senators, actual information, information that affected the votes of Senators, more real information gained, in a running debate where questions are freely asked than there is in all the set speeches that were ever made in this body.

I can see, Mr. President, why some desire this legislation at the present time. The Senate of the United States is the only legislative body to-day where the Representatives of a State can speak, through the press, to the American people untrammeled; and when I stop to think that the different departments of Government have 47 publicity bureaus, spending millions upon millions of dollars for no other purpose than to inform the people of the country at Government expense of the doings of the administration, and in many cases one word for action and ten words for individual laudation——

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the Senator mean to misinform?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say every Senator knows that a great deal of it is misinformation. Some of it has been brought to the attention of the Senate. More of it ought to have been brought to the attention of the Senate. As far as I am personally concerned, it would have been brought to the attention of the Senate but for the fact that I was fearful of the results. There is one overruling thought I have constantly in mind, one great hope in my heart, and that is to win the war, and I have stood by and seen these indefensible things occurring nearly every day in the month and every month in the year, and I have said nothing.

I know my time has expired. I do hope that the Senate will not adopt this amendment to the rules.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask if I have spoken on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has addressed the Senate upon the pending amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood that the Senator from North Dakota addressed the Senate upon the original amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. Has he occupied the time on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, of course, is bound to construe that when a Senator addresses the Senate he addresses it on the pending amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I will state the reason why I made the inquiry. I was under the impression that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] offered an amendment. I may be mistaken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska simply stated that at the appropriate time he would offer an amendment, but he did not tender it, because of the pendency of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask whether the Members of the Senate are to give the construction to this unanimous-consent agreement that a Senator may speak after 2 o'clock 10 minutes upon the resolution itself and 10 minutes in addition upon any amendment that may be proposed? My understanding was that after 2 o'clock no Senator could speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes on either the original resolution or an amendment, and that all debate was to cease, except the debate of 10 minutes allowed to each Senator after 2 o'clock, whether on the resolution or on an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to have the unanimous-consent agreement read?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I wish to have the construction of the Chair whether a Senator may speak 10 minutes upon the resolution after 2 o'clock and 10 minutes upon any amendment in addition thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the distinguished Senator from North Dakota will kindly pardon the Chair, the present occupant of the chair does not wish to escape any duty or burden, but if the unanimous-consent agreement is to be construed it ought to be construed by the Senate. If, however, the Senator requests the present occupant of the chair to construe it, the Chair would not shirk that duty, although he would prefer to have the Senate construe it.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me to be very plain, because it reads "not longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution or any amendment offered thereto," not "10 minutes upon the resolution and 10 minutes upon an amendment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the construction of the present occupant of the chair is sought, he has no hesitancy in saying that if called upon to construe it his construction would be that a Senator under this unanimous-consent agreement could not speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may be pardoned, I wish to ask unanimous consent to have printed as an appendix to my remarks a certain letter from Lieut. Gen. Sir George Baden-Powell upon the rules of the Parliament of England, and also a short extract from Sir John George Bourinot's "Parliamentary Procedure and Practice in the Dominion of Canada."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as a part of his remarks, the extracts he has indicated. Is there objection? There being none, it is so ordered. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. FALL. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It had better be read. I will not make the suggestion of there being no quorum if any Senator desires to speak at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the last word in the substitute add the following:

And provided further, That this rule limiting debate shall not apply, except by unanimous consent, to any bill, measure, or question which has been determined upon or agreed to by or in a party caucus or conference of Senators of the majority party.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	New	Smith, Ga.
Baird	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Brandegee	Kendrick	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Phelan	Sutherland
Cummins	King	Poindexter	Swanson
Curtis	Kirby	Pomerene	Thomas
Dillingham	Knox	Ransdell	Thompson
Fall	Lenroot	Reed	Tillman
France	Lewis	Robinson	Townsend
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Saulsbury	Trammell
Gallinger	McKellar	Shafroth	Underwood
Gerry	McLean	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gronna	McNary	Sherman	Watson
Gulon	Martin	Shields	Willey
Hale	Nelson	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], having in charge the pending measure to limit debate by any one Senator to 1 hour and 30 minutes upon any proposition that may hereafter come before the Senate, utilized about two hours in opening the discussion on this measure, and thereafter spoke the second time, consuming another hour in explaining his reasons why a Senator should be limited to an hour and a half debate upon any pending question.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] spoke about two hours to convince the Senate that no Senator was ever justified in discussing a subject longer than one hour and a half, and that any Senator could present his views properly upon any subject in an hour's debate.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing those Senators for violating in the initial debate upon this subject the very principles for which they are contending; I am not criticizing any of those Senators, even though I know that, by looking over the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the past year, it will be found that those who now so earnestly advocate the passage of a resolution for the limitation of debate have taken probably three-fourths of the printed pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so far as it relates to debate in the Senate.

I have listened day after day and hour after hour to the lucid arguments of the Senator from Iowa. I do not think he ever put a word into the RECORD that ought not to have gone into it. I know it is generally supposed by the public that the Senators who talk longest upon any subject and fill the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD necessarily are better informed than those who say very little. We here in the Senate know that is not necessarily the case. It may be that some Senators love their own voices better than other Senators love theirs; it may be that they have greater information; it may be that they have greater facility of expression, and there are good legislators who are perfectly willing to sit by and allow those who can better express their sentiments to do so; but, Mr. President, I reserve the right—and I think it is a right—to accord to the Senator from Iowa, if he can better express my views, to use more than an hour in expressing them; and if he has information upon a subject of which I am not possessed, I not only should accord him that extra hour or two hours, but even longer, if it be necessary for him to enlighten the Senate and also to enlighten me upon the subject. So I can see no good reason in the world for attempting to stifle the voice of Senators upon the many subjects that may be brought before us.

But, Mr. President, we shall not gain any time. If a Senator can not make his explanation of a matter within an hour or within an hour and a half, he will take the necessary time, and he will be able to do it under the amended rule. It is not the fact that the Senator from Iowa or other Senators who make long speeches and who take up so many pages of the RECORD have failed to boil down their statements to the least possible number of words that accounts for the time and space taken by them. It is because they repeat themselves, and they repeat themselves very often. Why? Not because they wish to do it, but because Senators are coming in and going out all the time. A Senator may have an audience of 30 at this minute, and in 10 minutes he may have an audience of another 30 Senators in the Senate Chamber. He will then go over the same argument the second time. The Senator from Iowa does that; we all do it; and the Senator from Iowa will find a way to do it again if it is necessary, and I assume that he will do it. If he has not expressed to all of the Senators his conviction upon some weighty subject, he will introduce an amendment, and he will take 20 minutes more. Then if he has not finished his speech and believes that he can convince a new audience of incoming Senators he will take another 20 minutes on another amendment. If he fails to secure a sufficient audience in all of his addresses or in some of his efforts, he will ask Senators to allow him to speak longer than the 20 minutes or one hour and a half, and permission to do so will be granted, and he will in the end consume just as much time as he would under the present rules of the Senate.

But the injustice of this proposed rule is that without a specific rule upon the subject which will say that it can not be modified even by unanimous consent it will be relaxed in many instances at the request of one Senator, and that courtesy will be denied the very next day at the instance of a Senator who has not taken half the time that some Senator has taken to whom the relief has been accorded. So it will work an injustice without in any way limiting debate.

Not only that, Mr. President, but a Senator, if he can not get time to express himself upon a given subject and in a way that will clearly explain his vote, will wait until the next bill comes up, and under the rules of the Senate he will then finish his speech, as Senators have done again and again in the Senate of the United States. Therefore we shall not gain one hour or one minute of time.

Mr. President, I am against this resolution for another reason. All of the arguments that have been made by the proponents of the resolution, all of the arguments that have been made in favor of it by others, have not enlightened us as to why the resolution should be brought before us now. On the contrary, Senators have stated again and again that it is not necessary. The Senator from Alabama declared that the Senate had not abused the privilege of discussion since this war began; he declared that there was no danger that the Senate would abuse the privilege of unlimited debate during this war. Mr. President, if Senators have not done so, and if they will not do so, then, in the name of heaven, give us one solitary, honest reason why it is necessary to shackle Senators in their discussion of any subject before the Senate of the United States? And why will they not abuse the right of debate? Because there is not a Senator in this Chamber, there is not a Member of this body, who is not patriotic; and any Senator of the United States who would obstruct, by longer discussion than would be necessary, a bill that would affect our war progress would be a traitor to his country; he would be guilty of an act of treason; and he should be and would be immediately expelled by the patriotic Members of the Senate body. Then why bring in this resolution now?

I know there has been some criticism on the part of the press about Congress delaying legislation, but every Senator knows it is not true. We know that we have not delayed legislation in any respect whatever. Then why this resolution? It is a reflection upon the honesty, the patriotism, the ability of the individual Senators of the United States. I, as one Senator, Mr. President, decline to plead guilty to a charge of that kind; and, so far as my vote can speak, I decline to cast upon my brothers the imputation that they have or that they will during this war be so unpatriotic as to delay necessary legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, for some time there has been pressed before the Committee on Rules a proposition to adopt majority cloture. I am very much opposed to majority cloture; but in the committee I finally agreed to the proposed rule embodied in the pending resolution in preference to majority cloture. I shall vote for the resolution as the action of the committee; but in doing so I do not in any way mean to commit myself to the propriety of a rule of this kind even during the war, and if within the next 30 days we should conclude that we did not desire to maintain or to continue it, by my vote to-day I in no sense mean to indicate that I would continue to vote for it. I can not now with propriety vote against it, as I think, on account of my attitude in the committee in regard to it; but I wish to state that in voting for it I do so as the result of the action of the committee, and that I am not convinced that it is wise as a permanent proposition. I only vote for it as a temporary measure.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] when he introduced the resolution said, if I recollect aright, that whereas it is proposed to amend the rule for the period of the war, it was his expectation that it would remain as a permanent rule of this body; that is, be, as it were, an entering wedge to break down the rule which has obtained all these years, and which has become a part of the constitution of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to what I said being quoted; but as the Senator was not in the Chamber when I spoke this morning, and what I said the other day is not in accord with what the Senator has stated, I hope, if he intends to quote me at all, that he will take the RECORD, which lies on his desk, and quote me accurately on the subject.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he did not state, not perhaps in his opening address, but let me say in the report he submitted, which is substantially the same thing, that, whereas this amendment to the rules was proposed for the period of the war, it was expected that on account of its beneficent operation it would remain a permanent rule of this body?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said nothing of that kind in reporting the rule. I have said, so far as I am personally concerned, that I should be glad to see a permanent cloture rule; but I did not say that in the report. I reported the rule as the committee instructed me to report it, and in the language of the report stated that it was to be operative during the period of the war.

Mr. PHELAN. On page 2 of the report the Senator states:

It is therefore proposed that instead of amending the existing cloture rule, that the delay and lack of consideration given important legislation, which is caused by unlimited debate, be met and remedied for the period of the present war by fixing a reasonable limitation on the time that each Member shall be privileged to discuss pending legislation and limiting that time to 1 hour to the main question and 20 minutes to amendments thereto, unless the Member desiring additional time obtains the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not sustain what the Senator quoted me as saying in reporting the resolution; namely, that it was my purpose to make it extend beyond the war. I do not hesitate to say to the Senator, so far as my individual opinion is concerned, that I believe in a cloture rule in the Senate; but I reported the resolution for the committee, and expressed the views of the committee, which limited the operation of the proposed rule to the duration of the war and no further.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, one of the objections to any limitation, it strikes me, is evidenced by the limitation imposed upon Senators after 2 o'clock to-day, which confines me to 10 minutes and makes it impossible for me to verify the references I have in mind. Here, however, is the exact language of this report, page 3, and the Senator has said he personally favors cloture:

The committee has limited the scope of the rule to the length of the present war. Within that time it can be tried out. If it proves satisfactory, it can be extended by reenactment. If it should prove unsatisfactory at the close of the war, it will cease to be a rule of the Senate by the time limitation contained in the resolution.

Mr. President, there has been no abuse, so far as I have observed, of the existing rules of the Senate, and therefore it is not fair to state, as the ostensible reason for the proposed amendment of the rules, that the object is to facilitate war legislation. There has been no interruption of or interference with war legislation, but both sides of the Chamber have acquiesced in the recommendations of the President; indeed, there has been an unprecedented condition, for there has developed perfect unity on both sides of the Chamber for the purpose of strengthening the hands of the Executive. Why, therefore, precipitate this discussion at this time? There is no reason for it. The present rule provides that, on the petition of one-sixth of the membership of this body, two-thirds of the Members voting and present may limit debate. That rule has never been invoked by the Senators who now fear that war legislation will be interrupted because there is not a more drastic cloture. On two or three occasions it was sufficient to mention that rule to bring about a perfectly unanimous understanding as to limitations to be put upon debate. Hence our present very beneficent rule, without being invoked in terms, has served the very purpose which Senators seek by again amending the rules in order to facilitate our work.

Very few have offended. Some Senators have been a little prolix, but they are responsible to their constituents. Their purpose was not to delay legislation, so far as I have observed, but they simply lacked, apparently, the facility of concise statement. That is their misfortune as well as our misfortune; but we are not obliged to listen. It is the history of this body that there are empty benches occasionally when a Senator exceeds what, in the judgment of the absentees, may be a reasonable time limit. I believe it was held in the House of Commons that, whereas a man had a right to speak, he had no right to be heard. There is no way of compelling men to listen unwillingly to an address; and hence every reason in favor of speedy action should appeal to the speaker, because every man likes, at any rate, to hold his audience. It is said that in the House of Commons—and this distinguishes the members of that body from those of the French Chamber of Deputies—the object of the members in speaking is to help things along, whereas in the French Chamber of Deputies the object is to show capacity. We are not afflicted with a membership that desires to show capacity. I believe that the membership of the Senate is desirous to help things along.

Mr. President, I have been interrupted and will inquire how many minutes I have remaining?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has two minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. Has the time taken by the Senator from Alabama been taken out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that has not been taken out. The Senator must take charge of the floor for himself.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, my predicament must certainly be in the estimation of the Senate an argument against cloture. I had much to say, but I can not say it in 10 minutes. I wish, however, to make two points.

The Senate rules serve by arresting hasty action. Members of the House have appealed to me to save the power of the Senate on which the Members of the House themselves so often rely. On it the country relies to have time to deliberate and if necessary protest. This is a plea for legislative independence. Shall we make our President an autocrat? If the Senate fails to hold up improper legislation then the appeal will be to the President, and we will find the people looking to the Executive for protection, instead of to their representatives in the Senate. That is a dangerous tendency now accentuated by the exigencies of war. What shall we say of encouraging such a tendency in the time of peace?

Again, this broad country has many conflicting interests. It is not fully homogeneous. The South has its interests, and I deplore to see the South, living now in the promised land of content and abundance, forgetting its distress when a hostile Congress sought to impose the force bill upon it. It is incredible to hear that the South should support a further restriction upon debate. Shall they idly discard these parliamentary weapons?

As for the West, we have racial problems of our own. The western coast standing alone without any sympathy from or understanding on the part of the East, attempted to stem the tide of oriental immigration, and if we are now forgetful of the past, and again Congress should attempt to impose upon the western coast an undesirable immigration, there should be power in the western Senators to stand up here and inform the country of its duty and not be shut off in debate. Even if it took a week or two weeks, would we not be legislating, in an instance of that kind, for the ages? Let us, men of the West, retain our power to protect our States.

Who among you will deny the right of a Senator of a sovereign State to speak for his people when they are in imminence of destruction? Those conditions may arise. Therefore I am not one of those, when there is no war necessity for it, when it is not asked for by the administration, who will support a measure which will operate so disadvantageously not only to sections but to the whole country. Men are carried away by passion, heat, and rancor, and they enact laws thoughtlessly; again they enact laws ignorantly. Debate restrains passion; debate restrains heat; debate restrains rancor, and at the same time debate commands deliberation. Therefore I oppose the arbitrary rule and stand for the power and dignity of the Senate which has served the country so well in this war. It is now a representative body of the people themselves who know how to curb excesses and can and will correct all abuses.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I am in favor of the resolution as originally reported by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] from the Committee on Rules limiting the time for debate on any question during the war to one hour, and to 20 minutes on any amendment proposed to any bill or resolution.

One hour, in my judgment, is sufficient time for any Senator to fairly present any ordinary question which comes before the Senate for consideration, and unanimous consent upon any extraordinary occasion could no doubt easily be obtained for any Senator if it should possibly require a longer time for him to present his views. The greatest speech ever delivered—Lincoln's Gettysburg Address—contained only 264 words, and required less than five minutes to deliver. The highest courts in many of the States only allow one-half hour for attorneys to present their cases on appeal. The very best legal argument I ever heard was only 30 minutes in length, and involved intricate constitutional questions. The greatest objection which is frequently made to our national legislative machinery is its apparent inability to produce quick results. The last Democratic national convention at St. Louis in 1916 recognized this feeling by adopting a clause in its platform, which I at the time had the honor and privilege to present to the platform committee, in the following terms:

We favor such alteration of the rules of procedure of the Senate of the United States as will permit the prompt transaction of the Nation's legislative business.

The Democratic Party is the first political party to make this worthy reform a part of its national platform.

The United States Senate is generally regarded as being the most dilatory legislative body in the world. No other legislative body has any such absurd rule as what we term "the rule of unlimited debate." No other legislative body permits the discussion of every other subject under the sun except the question before that body for consideration. This is the greatest evil of our rule, and, I believe, was brought about by a wrong interpretation of the original intention of the rule. It was certainly never assumed or even imagined when the rule was adopted that any Senator would not be confined in his remarks to the question under consideration. It is certainly a ridiculous procedure and a very strained construction of parliamentary law that permits a Senator to arise in his place and boldly announce that he desires to address the Senate but does not intend to talk upon the question before the Senate. I believe under our present rules that such a statement would warrant any Presiding Officer in holding the Senator out of order, yet it is never done, and would certainly justify the Senate in refusing to permit him to further proceed. It must be apparent to everyone that a decided change is needed in this old, nonsensical rule, or in the strained and unreasonable construction placed upon it by ourselves and our presiding officers, which permits and encourages what is known as the filibuster, the worst obstruction to fair and honest legislation and the worst hindrance to legitimate debate and orderly procedure ever devised. Under such a rule it is within the power of a few Senators to absolutely control legislation, and instead of legislation being the best judgment of the majority of the whole Senate it results in being the legislative will of a small minority. In a great crisis it is shocking to think of a single Senator obtaining the floor and holding undisputed possession of it as long as he can stand up and talk, and not even be required to discuss the question before the Senate. If the question under consideration is the currency, he can talk on the tariff, or, if he prefers, he can deliver a dissertation on the moon, the beauties of nature, or Dante's Inferno. If he tires of general discussion, he can read the unabridged dictionary or the Holy Bible. Nothing can stop him except physical exhaustion, and senatorial courtesy will often even then permit him to proceed after he has recovered from a temporary knock-out blow inflicted upon himself in his strenuous efforts to hold the floor until some one else with whom he is cooperating can secure the floor. To say the least, it is a strange commentary on our parliamentary procedure, and the time has come when it ought to be completely stopped.

Proposed legislation that will not stand the test of a vote is unworthy of consideration by the Senate. I have never participated in a filibuster, and I never will. No one pays attention to discussions in a filibuster, and it is scarcely within the power of any Senator, no matter how able or eloquent, to hold his colleagues longer than an hour. Indeed, I have always observed that when the time is limited to 10 or 15 minutes, as it is at the present time, that the seats of the Senate are always full, and every discussion made is exactly to the point, and Senators receive close attention of everyone present. I would favor striking out the clause limiting the proposed rule to during the period of the present war, and I hope and believe that some time, not far distant, the Senate will reach the conclusion that the business of the country requires the discontinuance altogether of a rule that will permit the obstruction of legislation.

There is no other legislative body in the world with such a rule, or that will tolerate such procedure under any rule, yet it has seemed impossible for us to do away with it, evidently because Senators do not want to give up the power that such an unfair advantage gives them in the control of legislation, or because, apparently in the minds of some Senators, this old rule by reason of its long existence has become more or less sacred. Most of the older Members seem to favor it, while most of the new Members seem opposed to it; and as only one-third of the Senate is composed of new Members it has been impossible for more than 100 years for a majority of the Senate to change its own rules in this respect.

We did slightly modify the rule at the beginning of this Congress, but as changed it requires a two-thirds vote and a long period of time to close debate, and is so unsatisfactory that it has never been invoked.

While I am in favor of the resolution as first reported from the Rules Committee, yet if we can not pass it in that form I am willing to vote for the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] limiting debate to 1 hour and 30 minutes, as the most advanced step in the right direction on this important question we can take at the present time, and shall live in hopes of our ability to make a better rule sometime in the near future.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it seems to me that the remarks of the Senator from Kansas, at least so far as his statement is concerned that a Senator may stand up here and talk as long as he is able to stand, are entirely unwarranted. The Senator forgets that the Senate already has in existence a cloture rule, which I send to the desk and ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

If at any time a motion, signed by 16 Senators, to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure is presented to the Senate, the presiding officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and one hour after the Senate meets on the following calendar day but one, he shall lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the presiding officer shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

"Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"

And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be the unfinished business to the exclusion of all other business until disposed of.

Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak in all more than one hour on the pending measure, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time. No dilatory motion, or dilatory amendment, or amendment not germane shall be in order. Points of order, including questions of relevancy and appeals from the decision of the presiding officer, shall be decided without debate. (S. Res. 5, 65th Cong., sp. sess.)

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator is also in error, I think, in stating that those who are opposed to the pending rule are opposed to it because they, as individuals, want to show and exert their power in this body, or that they are opposed to it for any personal reason whatever. I am opposed to this rule, but not for any personal reasons and not because I have ever found it necessary, I think, since I have been a Member of this body—which is a period of 13 years—to talk over an hour on any subject before the Senate. Usually I do not speak over 10 minutes; but I am opposed to shackling the freedom of debate in the Senate for these reasons:

In the first place, there is no rule in the Senate which compels an amendment offered to a bill to be germane to the subject under consideration, and it is the experience of this body that after debate has proceeded on a bill to the point where everybody is ready to vote on the bill, somebody gets up who is in charge of some special propaganda or measure in which he is interested, of an entirely different character, involving an entirely different set of questions, involving research and examination into an entirely different set of authorities, and offers that, an entirely new bill, perhaps of 15 or 20 pages, as an amendment to the pending measure. It can not be declared out of order; and then the Senate is to be driven to a vote upon that under this rule, if it shall prevail, with each Senator limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. President, I look at this right of debate not as a right, much less a privilege, which we are conferring upon ourselves as a matter of favor. I look upon it as a right which attaches to the sovereign States of this Union, each of which is represented here by two Senators, and whose sole method of putting its case before the people of the United States and before this body is through the voice of its two Senators.

Now, look at it. Here we are considering a bill, and somebody gets up and proposes a measure which is of vital interest, we will say, to the great State of Texas or New York or Pennsylvania. I believe in New York State there are over 10,000,000 people now, and the interests involved there are tremendous; and yet you propose to fix it in this body so that any Senator at the last minute may get up and propose an amendment of vital interest to the 10,000,000 people in the State of New York and to all their property interests, and confine the two Senators from the Empire State to 20 minutes in discussing that amendment!

So I say that this is the forum of the States. This is a federated government, in which the States reserved the right of equal suffrage in the Senate of the United States, and made that the only provision of the Constitution which never should be subject to amendment.

The Senator from Kansas says that this is the only legislative body in the world that permits freedom of debate without limit. This is the only Government in the world that is at the same time a Federal Government and a government of sovereign States, a dual form of government; and there is no such body in the world as this body. It is formed upon a different theory, a different basis, and represents an entirely different political ideal and thought from that of any other body; and for 130 years it has helped to turn out laws which have made this country the greatest and most prosperous country in the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet the Senator from Kansas was wrong in that statement, for the reason that there is no limitation of debate in the legislative assembly of Canada.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know that, Mr. President. Then the Senator was wrong in another aspect of his statement. But, Mr. President, the Senator was also wrong in saying that there is no limit upon debate in this body; and I have put into the RECORD the evidence of it, the resolution that we adopted at just the last session of the present Congress, the Sixty-fifth Congress. I have not bothered the Secretary to read that resolution; I did not want to take the time, because all Senators are familiar with it, except the Senator from Kansas; but it provides that at any time when the Senators vote that they have heard enough discussion upon a matter, then no Senator, after a day or two, can speak more than one hour upon the bill and all amendments to it—one hour in all. Is not that a sufficiently severe change to wreak upon the rights of the Senate in one session of Congress, which has indicated no reason whatever, so far as its conduct is concerned, for even that change? We have all been so faithful to our duty, and have all realized so fully the tremendous importance of making haste as much as possible during these war days, that there is no difficulty here at any time in getting unanimous consent, as has been done on this very gag rule, for a vote upon it here this afternoon not later than 4 o'clock. So that there never was a proposition brought forward to produce so violent a change which had so little reason, founded upon the experience of the Senate, to justify it.

Mr. President, I know that the Democratic Party has prided itself upon being a State-rights party, but it has been no more a Sate-rights party than the Republican Party has been. The Republican Party and the Whig Party believed just as much in the rights of the States to exercise the powers which they reserved to themselves as the Democratic Party ever did. We all admit, every writer admits, and every decision of every court of the country admits, that this is a dual form of government, that the Federal Government is a government of delegated powers, and that, as the tenth amendment of the Constitution says, all powers not specifically delegated to the General Government are reserved to the States themselves or to the people thereof. Nobody can be a good American without being a good State-rights man. I admit that when the Democratic Party, or at least that portion of it which resided in the 11 States which attempted to secede from the Union, carried their theory of State rights to the point where they asserted the right of secession, then the phrase "State rights" became unpopular in the country; but it was unpopular not because the States exercised the rights that they ought to exercise but only because they claimed the right to secede from the Union, and that for a long time threw a great many people into a reaction against State rights. One of the sacred rights of the States, in my opinion, is to have their case thoroughly placed before this great legislative body before the previous question is ordered and all debate has to stop.

There are many States and many sections of this country that have local interests in common, and when a propaganda or a proposition is started for legislation that may affect one section of this country very disadvantageously the only chance that they can get to disseminate the reasons why that proposition should not be put into law is in the United States Senate, where there has been heretofore freedom of debate. As I say, it has been so exceedingly seldom that it has been abused that I hate to see the Senate start in to commit hari-kari, to diminish and dwarf itself and its own powers for good, by putting here in advance a gag rule into the mouths of the representatives of sovereign States, so that they can not speak more than 20 minutes on an amendment that may be more vital to their States than the provisions of the bill. Why, debate of 20 minutes apiece in the Senate—many of the Senators do not speak very much—would hardly give a chance for a Senator to get petitions down from his State or to ascertain the position which his constituents took upon a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall support the pending resolution. I should much prefer to vote for the previous question without any limitations upon it except the will of the majority of this Chamber. I have entire confidence in the majority of the Senate of the United States being liberal and fair to any Senator who wants to be heard upon any question. I do not think we are in any danger of being choked off by a majority of this body from saying anything that a man has a right to say or to ask to be heard upon. I should prefer to rely upon the majority. I think it is safer to rely upon the majority than to rely upon the minority. The majority may make mistakes, and probably will, and will correct mistakes. The minority are somewhat more apt to make mistakes, just in degree as the minority is a minority, just as one man is more apt to make a mistake than a hundred men.

The safest way for a republic is to rely with confidence upon a majority. That is the principle upon which our Government is really founded; and the Senate in departing from that ancient principle of this republican Government of ours has weakened itself. The old rule does not promote debate. It merely permits a Senator who is prolix, as the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] says, to use the time of the Senate to a point when it vacates these seats.

We do not have debate in the Senate in any real sense. Men get up and make speeches; men talk; but debate in the Senate has been practically destroyed by our rules. I think the rule would be much better if we would have the confidence to rely upon the sound judgment and good temper and good humor of the majority of this body. I believe the majority would always give any time that any Senator desired to be heard.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is it in order to offer an amendment at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; there is an amendment pending.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the unanimous-consent agreement does not shut off the offering of amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Only the debate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Only the debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will offer it later, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. FALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may the Secretary state the amendment to the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That this rule limiting debate shall not apply, except by unanimous consent, to any bill, measure, or question which has been determined upon or agreed to by or in a party caucus or conference of the Senators of the majority party.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it probably will do no good, but nevertheless I want to make one final appeal to my associates upon the other side of the Chamber, as well as upon this side, not to unnecessarily and unduly bridle the Senate by the adoption of this amendment to the rules.

The suggestion that filibustering is now possible is not true. Sixteen Senators may sign a request, and the question of proceeding to a vote must be immediately submitted on the following day; if two others oppose, the rule is operative; and I want to beg the Senators upon the other side to weigh the consequences to their States of this very unnecessary and unwise action.

How often I have seen it tested where it has proven of decided advantage to the State. I have seen my venerable friend, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], straighten out a tangle in this body which concerned vitally the people of South Carolina under this great privilege which accompanies the senatorial office, and tends to dignify it and make it possible for Senators holding seats in this body to protect their States. I remember how the Senator from South Carolina shocked his associates by the course he pursued; but the State of South Carolina has sustained him for nearly a quarter of a century for what he did, and, in my opinion, the State of South Carolina will sustain him again for his fidelity, now that he is before the people of his State for their suffrage.

I can not see any necessity or any wisdom in the adoption of this rule. I see great harm to come from it. I see, as I said the other day, the supremacy of party caucus, reincarnated and crowned again in this body; and it is not right. Senators do not do themselves justice. New Senators can not afford to do it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Old ones can not, either.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to the Senator from South Carolina, who out of the wisdom and the experience of his long service here says: "And old ones can not afford to do it, either."

I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was out of the Chamber when a very pertinent inquiry was suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that when Henry Clay in this body once proposed a form of cloture the then Senator from Alabama, Mr. King, went over and told Henry Clay, according to the story, that if he had any such thing as that to propose to the Senate of the United States he had better engage his boarding-house quarters for a good long time, because he would need them for a long time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. KING. And I might say to the Senator, supplementing that great debate, that every great Democratic Senator, including Benton and others, denounced the rule, and finally Mr. Clay was compelled to abandon the proposition to enforce it upon the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator from Utah. If any injustice is ever done in the Senate of the United States, it is done to its membership by denying to Members equal privileges with every other Member here. It is nothing for the chairman of a great committee to rise here and to do almost anything he wants to do; but it is something for a Senator who has only been here for a short time to obtain proper recognition for his State, and he can only get it when he can stand upon every prerogative that goes with the senatorial office.

I have nothing to gain personally by this. I do not expect to be a Member of the Senate very long at best, but I do want my colleague and my successor to defend their State with all the power that precedent and practice in this Chamber have given Senators. I do not want to take any more time. I understand that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] would like to say a word, and I will cheerfully yield. There is five minutes more; and while I can not yield the floor to him, I do yield in order that he may, if he can get recognition, say a word.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the moment that is left I simply want to call attention to what I think are two or three fallacies that have been indulged, which I believe are controlling the opinions of some Senators. One is that the absence of Senators from the Chamber is caused by the length of the speech that is being made.

Mr. President, the absence of Senators from the Chamber is not due to the length of the speeches that men are making. It is due to two things. One is the lack of interest which sometimes possesses Senators, for there are some Senators who take but little interest in passing legislation. The chief reason, however, is found in the fact that we are holding committee meetings, or that Senators are busy with departmental work, and are kept from the Chamber; and accordingly they leave whenever a speech is on, because they want to do something else or because they are called to a committee; and that will not be changed when you limit debate to an hour and a half. If they go out now when a man is speaking, and they do not know whether he will speak three minutes or three hours, and the time of the vote is therefore accordingly uncertain, they will do that with an hour and a half limit, for they will know when a man rises that he may at least speak an hour and a half.

The chief difficulty that is back of absenteeism is the fact that men are busy elsewhere. For instance, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], as chairman of the great Banking Committee, has before that committee a bill of vast importance; and this morning, though we were proceeding under a 10-minute rule on this important and revolutionary measure, the Senator from Oklahoma was conducting hearings in that committee. I as a member of that committee was compelled to make my choice between being with the committee and being on the floor of the Senate. So that this rule will not compel attendance, and will not bring here any greater numbers than we have under present circumstances. I think, therefore, that that fallacy might as well be dropped out of mind.

In the moment that is left I challenge the attention of the Senate to the fact that two of the members of the committee reporting this revolutionary measure have plainly signified their own doubt as to its wisdom. One of them, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], has stated upon the floor that he doubts its wisdom, and his speech amounted almost to an appeal to the Senate to beat the measure. I call attention to another fact—that one of the earnest advocates of this resolution, one of the best Senators in this body, and one of its longest talkers, spoke three hours yesterday in favor of a resolution limiting debate to an hour and a half!

Why, Mr. President, when you put this measure into execution it will simply be a weapon that will reduce the individual power of Senators, and if it is adopted it will open the door for real cloture; and if Southern Senators adopt it I shall be willing to see real cloture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed to vote.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The vote will be taken upon the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. FALL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I am informed that I am relieved from that pair on this vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by personal illness, and the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], by illness in his family. I ask to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. If present, he would vote "yea." I also announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is necessarily absent, due to sickness in his family, and if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 35, as follows:

So Mr. FALL's amendment to Mr. CUMMINS's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] as amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that we are voting upon the so-called Cummins amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands it, it leaves the first three lines of the committee's resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. Let the amendment as amended be read.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Alabama undertook to agree to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, but there was an objection to it. Therefore, if I am correct, we are now to vote upon the so-called Cummins amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As a substitute for that portion of the committee amendment which it seeks to amend.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator has stated it correctly. I am in favor of that, and I understand the committee reporting the resolution are in favor of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it for the information of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to understand if the first three lines are going to be a part of the rule.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment that is to be voted on.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of Senate resolution 235, as printed, it is proposed to strike out all of lines 21, 22, 23, and 24, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert the following, as amended:

That no Senator shall occupy more than 1 hour and 30 minutes in debate on any bill or resolution and not more than 20 minutes on any amendment proposed thereto: Provided, That the Senate upon request may enlarge the time by a majority vote, the question to be decided without debate: Provided further, That when an amendment is pending a Senator may use all or any part of his time allowed for debate upon the bill or resolution: And provided further, That this rule limiting debate shall not apply, except by unanimous consent, to any bill, measure, or question which has been determined upon or agreed to by or in a party caucus or conference of Senators of the majority party.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If the Cummins amendment as amended is adopted by the affirmative vote of the Senate, will the question then recur upon the entire resolution, so that another vote will be assured?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. REED. That is the point I wanted a ruling on.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the Secretary may read the part to be stricken out for which the Cummins amendment is a substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out that part reported by the committee which reads as follows:

That no Member shall occupy more than one hour in debate, unless by unanimous consent, on any bill or resolution and not over 20 minutes on each amendment proposed thereto.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Cummins amendment is agreed to, the resolution will still be open to amendment. We are not proceeding as in Committee of the Whole, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; we are not proceeding as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have this object in view. It is open to amendment now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that any amendment which goes to the substance of the Cummins amendment as amended should now be presented, as it would be too late to present an amendment to it after it is once adopted, but that the three lines of the original amendment might be amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very good. I simply want to suggest a mere verbal change. I think the first word "That" ought to be stricken out, because it is in the resolving part of the resolution, and this is to be a rule, and we would not want to commence the rule with that word. I think it would be preferable to have it read, "No Senator shall," and so forth. It is a mere verbal change.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that that amendment is offered by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not want to amend it unless with the consent of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the suggestion is material enough to require an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether the Senator from Connecticut offers it or not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the amendment as amended, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, and asking that the announcement stand for the day, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 73, nays 3, as follows:

YEAS—73.

Ashurst	Harding	New	Smith, Ga.
Baird	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smith, Mich.

Dillingham	Lenroot	Reed	Townsend
Fall	Lewis	Robinson	Underwood
France	Lodge	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shafroth	Watson
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard	Weeks

Calder	Gore	Jones, N. Mex.	Wadsworth
Colt	Hardwick	Jones, Wash.	Walsh
Fernald	Henderson	La Follette	Warren
Fletcher	Hollis	Penrose	Williams
Goff	James	Pittman	Wolcott

So the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the resolution as amended.

Mr. REED and Mr. SMOOT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], but upon this question I am at liberty to cast my vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the two former votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as I did on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness in his family. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). My announcement of the transfer of my pair applies to all votes on this resolution. I vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. If present, I do not know how he would vote on this question. I therefore transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I vote "nay."

Mr. President, I ask permission to spread the reasons for my vote on the RECORD.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the two former votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I previously made and the same transfer as on the last ballot, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

I also announce the absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] is detained by a death in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Lenroot	Pomerene	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Lewis	Ransdell	Swanson

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask if my request was granted for permission to spread on the RECORD my reasons for voting against the resolution which has just been rejected? If not, I ask permission now to state my reasons.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let the Senator give his reasons.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, am I permitted to spread my reasons on the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not without delivering them here in the Senate. The Chair suggests that the Senator deliver them now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, Mr. President, the reasons are these: Under the privilege of unlimited debate I stood on the floor right by this seat, with this desk piled high with books, which I did not intend to read, but which I would have read rather than to have failed to accomplish my purpose by a filibuster to recover for my State from the United States money justly due that State on account of expenditures by it in the War of 1812. Through the power reposed in the hands of individual Senators I then was able to secure for the State the money belonging to the State.

In explaining what I mean, I take the liberty of inserting an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 5, 1903, in regard to the old claim which I have mentioned. The matter is fully explained in the speech I made on that occasion, and it is shown that by threatening a filibuster, instead of the State of South Carolina having to pay money to the United States Government on account of repudiated bonds, the accounting of the comptroller showed that the Federal Government owed South Carolina. As a result of the action then taken I had the pleasure of carrying to the governor of South Carolina a United States Treasury warrant to cover the amount due the State [$89,137.86], together with $125,000 of South Carolina State bonds, which the Government held and in which some Indian trust funds had been invested. The brief extract to which I have referred is as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN. * * * Then, what did I do? What ought I to have done? It has been eighty-odd years since South Carolina spent her money in defense of the national flag. Every other State in the same category has had its money and has gone—some of them 50 years ago. The Palmetto State was left out in the cold. I simply shut my jaws down on the proposition that I would have that money or I would have an extra session; and I was in a position, under the rules of the Senate, to enforce it, thank God. If the Senate changes its rules I may never get an item again; but, thank God, I have only one more, and that is for the reimbursement of money expended in the war of 1836 with the Indians. There are about $60,000 due South Carolina on that account. I ought to get that some day, but having levied "legislative blackmail," according to my distinguished friend, I suppose the State will have to wait until the 80 years come around. That is the limitation at which South Carolina may hope to get consideration, I suppose.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I inquire of the Senator from Maryland if it is his purpose to press the District of Columbia appropriation bill to-night?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It is not.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My reason for asking the question is that, if the Senator is not going to press that bill this afternoon, I should like to secure the adoption of the conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I do not expect to proceed with the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill this afternoon.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He can not yield to two Senators at once, the Chair will announce. He has yielded to the Senator from Oregon.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill submitted by me a few days ago and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3379) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange public coal lands for private coal lands in certain cases (No. 501); and

A bill (S. 4439) to provide for the survey of a national highway connecting certain national monuments in the States of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico (No. 502).

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment providing for the purchase, exchange, care, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger and delivery vehicles, to be used in connection with the Botanic Garden in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 2380) granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 13, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we would praise and magnify Thy Holy Name, for the nobler qualities of soul which we recognize as the better angels of our nature; truth, justice, love, mercy, purity, altruism, which in times of great crises lift men out of themselves and make them heroes in the strife; illustrated in the stream of self-sacrifice for the suffering men, women, and children in the war zone; and in the patriotism displayed on the field of battle, than which no higher type can be cited than in the heroism of the young man whose letter to his mother was read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday; and while such sacrifices are poured out on the altar of liberty, the life and perpetuity of republics are insured, to the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the Military Academy appropriation bill for printing under the rule, and in the absence of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], with whom I have an agreement, I ask that all points of order be reserved in his name.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill H. R. 11185, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama in the name of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] reserves all points of order.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution for present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 392.

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House of Representatives the number of men in the service of the Food Administrator, Fuel Administrator, and all boards and commissions appointed by Executive order since April 5, 1917, who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years, for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification have been asked by such administrators, boards, or commissions and allowed; the name and home address of each such person; the character of work he is performing in the service of such administrators, board, or commission; and the length of time he has been in such service.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the present consideration of the resolution, would not the gentleman from Illinois be willing for the resolution to go to the Committee on Rules if he had the assurance that the resolution would be reported back at an early date for consideration? I can not tell from the reading of the resolution whether it is in such form as to get the information that a great many Members of the House would like to secure.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would not go to the Committee on Rules under the rule.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, to what committee would the resolution go? I was under the impression that it would go to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. To the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the Speaker to say that he would have to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. That is the Chair's first impression, but he knows no more about it than the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I thought if the gentleman from Illinois could be assured that it would be referred to some committee, and that that committee would give it early consideration and report it back, it might be wise to send it to the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I am perfectly willing to do whatever will meet the situation best. I do not want to ask the House to pass a resolution without its being satisfactory to the House and will bring the information that I wish to obtain. It makes no difference to me whether it is passed to-day or a week from to-day. So that I am perfectly willing to accede to the request of the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, if the Military Committee has jurisdiction of the resolution—I did not listen to the reading of it—I will promise the gentleman that the committee will give it early consideration.

Mr. GARNER. I will make a request for unanimous consent. I do not suppose the gentleman from Alabama is very anxious to consider this resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it go to the Committee on Rules. I have some assurance that that committee will give it early consideration and bring it back to the House.

Mr. MADDEN. The resolution is privileged, and if at the end of seven days the committee did not report it the committee could be discharged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas, who prefers the request for unanimous consent, what reason he has for treating this resolution, which I understand is in practically the identical language and form as the other resolutions that have been passed by the House, why he desires to treat this differently from the other resolutions? Is it because in this resolution we are calling on the President for the information, or because those resolutions already passed will not bring forth the information?

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I do not know whether the resolutions that have been passed heretofore are going to get the information that some Members of the House sought and hoped for. The reading of this resolution does not convince me that it will get the information that is in the minds of some Members of the House. It refers to two commissions, the Food and Fuel Commissions, and other heads of bureaus.

Mr. MADDEN. To boards and commissions appointed by Executive order since the declaration of war. The reason why this resolution was addressed to the President is that the Food Administrator and the Fuel Administrator and the commissions that have been appointed by Executive order have not the dignity of department heads to whom we could address a communication, and hence we are obliged to apply to the President of the United States in order that we might get the information and place it before us.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, of course these commissions or administrative boards were appointed by the President under proclamation authorized in the act reported to the House by the Committee on Agriculture, and if that committee has jurisdiction over legislation which made these commissions possible, it would seem that the Committee on Agriculture would be the proper committee to consider this resolution.

Permit me to remind the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that when he asked for information from another coordinate branch, viz, the Interstate Commerce Commission, he directed his inquiry directly to that commission.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, the reason for that is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is an independent department of the Government, not subject to the President of the United States or anyone else.

Mr. WALSH. I can not agree with the gentleman there. I think it is subject for appointment at least to the President of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects to the present consideration of the resolution, and the Chair will refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs, as that is his best impression as to the committee to which it ought to go. These boards in respect to which the gentleman from Illinois has directed his inquiry do not seem to be attached to any particular department.

DESECRATION OF THE FLAG.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a rereference of Senate bill 121, to prevent desecration of the flag of the United States, and to provide punishment therefor, from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on June 13, 1918, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5558. An act to amend section 101 of the Judicial Code;

H. R. 7796. An act to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the western district of Michigan;

H. R. 9864. An act to amend section 111 of the Judicial Code; and

S. 2380. An act granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT (647).

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the conference report upon the Post Office appropriation bill, H. R. 7237, for consideration at this time, and ask unanimous consent that debate upon the report may be had for four hours, two hours of the time to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and two hours by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up a conference report and asks unanimous consent that debate upon it be limited to four hours, two to be controlled by himself and two by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that although the pressure for time upon this side has been such that it would require a good deal more, yet in view of the urgent conditions in the House in respect to business and getting rid of it as soon as we can I have agreed with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office upon this proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the fact that these gentlemen have agreed among themselves ought not altogether to control the matter. I have no desire to prevent any necessary discussion, but we are getting within less than three weeks of the end of the fiscal year. It is necessary that the sundry civil appropriation bill, the fortifications appropriation bill, and another general deficiency bill should be passed by the House and agreed to by the Senate before that time. It is exceedingly important that we press these bills forward. The failure to pass them by the end of the fiscal year would entail the necessity of passing joint resolutions that only would inadequately provide for a lot of activities of the Government of the first importance. We are getting to a point where conference reports will come in here right along, and if every conference report is to take a day we will of course not anywhere near clean up the business of the session in time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. In a moment. I suggest that the gentlemen arrange for a very much shorter time than that suggested.

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that this bill carries about $385,000,000, and I believe a discussion of it would hasten agreement upon it, so that instead of this being conducive to delay it will hasten action.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, everyone knows that the bill is important, though the amount involved is no longer large. There is disagreement upon practically only one item, and there is no need of a debate for four hours in order to take care of the views of the House upon one item of any conference report.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I was about to suggest to the gentleman that, of course, a great many Members of the House are anxious to discuss the pneumatic-tube phase of this disagreement. Personally I would be willing to vote upon it without any discussion.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman not believe that nearly everyone in the Chamber, or every Member of the House, is conversant with the merits of the controversy concerning the tube business?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know that I could say that.

Mr. GARNER. And that two hours' debate, an hour on each side, would inform the House of whatever new issues might have arisen concerning the pneumatic tubes?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the disagreement upon the tube question as it appears in the bill has never been before the House.

Mr. GARNER. It is a new phase.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. To some extent there is justification for reasonable discussion, because it never has been before the House in its present form.

Mr. SHERLEY. Two hours would be double the time the rules provide.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to that; but, of course, I want to facilitate the transaction of business all I can.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present request.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, it is immaterial to me whether we debate this question at all or not. The gentleman from Minnesota desires six hours, and I want to accommodate him as much as I can. I therefore agreed to four hours, provided, of course, the House would agree to that. Objection is made, however, and in a further spirit of accommodation to the gentlemen upon the other side I shall change the request so as to make it three hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that debate upon this Post Office appropriation bill conference report shall be limited to three hours, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest that debate be had until 3 o'clock, and that then a vote be had.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, that is not fair, because one man could by making the point of order of no quorum shut off half of the debate. I think a certain length of time for debate ought to be fixed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the three hours? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the amendment proposed by the Senate, after the word "Winnepasaukee," insert the following: "from the post office at Laconia"; and the Senate agree to the same.

struing this section. So much as may be necessary for the increases provided for in this act is hereby appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 53: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the matter proposed by the Senate strike out the words "assistant postmasters and other supervisory employees and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amendment proposed by the Senate insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That the Postmaster General is authorized to investigate conditions arising from contracts in the star-route, screen-wagon, and other vehicle service entered into prior to June 30, 1917, and from contracts for furnishing envelopes, blanks, and blank books, and the Official Postal Guide, for contracts entered into prior to June 30, 1917, with a view to determining whether any adjustment should be made in the compensation and to adjust the same for materials or services hereafter to be furnished or rendered in cases where the facts disclose the necessity for such adjustment, or, in his discretion, with the consent of the contractor and his bondsmen, the Postmaster General may cancel such contracts."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 57: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$300,000"; and after the word "date" insert a period and strike out the remainder of the section reading as follows: "separately stating the income derived from the transportation of the mails and the transportation of farm products: Provided, That in establishing the routes they shall be equitably distributed among the several States"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "unsuitable for the purposes of the War Department" insert "but suitable for the use of the Postal Service"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "such positions" insert a period and strike out the remainder of the section reading as follows: "and once in each month the immediate family of any such employee while in the military or naval service of the United States or of any member or individual connected with the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe may send to such employee or member or individual one package of mail, not exceeding 3 pounds in weight, other than letter mail, without the request required by order No. 1259 of the Postmaster General"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 63: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of said amendments, as follows:

On amendments 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, and 27: These amendments relate to items of compensation for a stated number of employees at stipulated salaries, plus temporary increases for the next fiscal year provided in amendment 52, and the language inserted is for the purpose of making plain the legislative intent which made it necessary to increase the amounts to be appropriated therefor.

On amendments 2, 3, 5, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 30, 37, 46, and 51: These amendments also relate to the temporary increases for the next fiscal year for postal employees whose compensation is appropriated for in lump-sum allowances. The increases inserted by the Senate amendments are necessary to provide for the temporary increases proposed.

On amendment 8: Amendment 8 amends present law to enable postal employees entitled to compensatory time for Sunday or holiday service, if they so select, to accept pay for overtime in lieu of compensatory time. It is deemed that such legislation is wise and in the interest of good service, since many employees entitled to compensatory service within the week following prefer to work rather than take the time off.

On amendments 13 and 15: Amendments 13 and 15 make permanent law an identical amendment which has been repeated in each appropriation bill for a number of years. These amendments will make unnecessary the repetition of the same language in future appropriation bills.

On amendment 14: Increasing the appropriation by $300,000 is made necessary by the increased cost for rent, light, and fuel in first, second, and third class post offices.

On amendment 19: The amendment agreed to does not increase the appropriation, but makes available $300,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918.

On amendment 20: This amendment is merely clerical.

On amendment 21: Amendment 21 makes immediately available for the present fiscal year $100,000 for mail messenger service.

On amendment 22: This amendment relates to postage on drop letters in the city of New York, from which the Senate conferees receded.

On amendment 24: Amendment 24 relates to the mail service on Lake Winnepesaukee, N. H. A similar item has been carried in a number of previous bills, which fixed the salary of the carrier because of the peculiar conditions attending the service.

On amendment 25: Amendment 25 is a change in language made necessary by the preceding amendment.

On amendment 28: The word "regular" is inserted so as to enable the department to employ temporary railway postal clerks during certain emergencies, and is inserted to make clearer the legislative intent.

On amendment 29: The increased amount is necessary because of additional demands upon the service, provided for in this item.

On amendments 31 and 32: Amendment 31 is necessary because of an increase of $10,000 in the appropriation provided for in amendment 32, made necessary, upon the statement of the Postmaster General that the unusual conditions require the additional amount and is in the interest of good service.

On amendment 33: This amendment requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and determine fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of mail by urban and interurban electric railway common carriers, the same as is now the case with steam railways, and provides that after the rates are so fixed pursuant to due notice and hearing, as is usually provided, it shall be unlawful for such carriers to refuse to perform the service at the rates so prescribed.

On amendment 34: Amendment 34 increases the appropriation for censorship of foreign mails made necessary because of the increased labor involved, and makes immediately available $200,000 for that purpose.

On amendment 35: This amendment is intended to prevent duplication in the censorship of mails from the military forces connected with the American Expeditionary Force.

On amendment 36: Amendment 36 increases the appropriation for the manufacture of stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers due to the increased demands upon the department.

On amendments 38, 39, 40, 41, and 42: These amendments relate to the supply of sundry material for the Postal Service throughout the country, and the increases provided are necessary because of the rapid growth of the service and the unusual demands for material and supplies.

On amendment 43: Amendment 43 makes available additional appropriations necessary for material and supplies, and for $100,000 to be used by the Postmaster General for the installation and experiments with mail-distributing machines.

On amendment 44: Amendment 44 changes the word "chairs" to "chains" to correct a clerical error.

On amendment 45: This amendment materially increasing the appropriation provided by the House is necessary to enable the department to purchase raw material and better equip the shops in the city of Washington for the manufacture of mail bags, mail containers, etc. Recent bids disclosed that the cost for this material in the open market has increased approximately 100 per cent. The Post Office Department believes that with additional funds they could manufacture them on their own account with economy to the Government.

On amendments 47 and 48: Amendments 47 and 48 modify a provision heretofore carried in each appropriation bill and provide that no part of the fund for inland transportation by star routes shall be expended for star-route service which is already served by Rural Delivery Service, unless the services of a qualified rural carrier can not be secured, and makes the provision permanent law.

On amendments 49 and 50: These amendments relate to the compensation for rural delivery carriers. In substance, they include provisions contained in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and provide that rural carriers on horse-drawn vehicle routes shall receive $24 per mile per annum for each mile said routes are in excess of 24 miles, or major fraction thereof, based on actual mileage, the same as is now provided for routes in excess of 30 miles in length. On tri-weekly routes, $12 per mile per annum for each mile in excess of 24 miles is allowed the carrier. The present law respecting the compensation for motor-route carriers, who furnish their own automobiles, on routes not less than 50 miles in length is amended to increase their compensation from a maximum of $1,800 to a maximum of $2,160. The amendment by the Senate that a carrier may use such character of vehicle on horse-drawn routes as may be approved by the local postmaster is stricken out.

On amendment 52: Amendment 52 relates to temporary increases during the fiscal year for employees of the Postal Service, and, in substance, contains similar provisions to those contained in H. R. 9414 recently passed by the House, except that the salaries of assistant postmasters and clerks and carriers in first and second class post offices, railway postal clerks from grade 1 to grade 10, inclusive, and supervisory officials shall be increased not more than $200 during the next fiscal year. Supervisory officials receiving in excess of $2,200 receive an increase of 5 per cent. All other employees of the Postal Service whose compensation does not exceed $800 per annum are increased 20 per cent; those who receive from $800 to $1,500 per annum are increased 15 per cent. The salaries of rural carriers not in excess of $1,200 are increased 20 per cent.

No increases are provided for postmasters at first, second, and third class offices, but postmasters of the fourth class are allowed an additional increase of 100 per cent on cancellations up to $80 per quarter instead of $50, as at present, except that those whose compensation does not exceed $50 per quarter are increased 20 per cent. Provision is made, however, that such temporary increases shall not have the effect of advancing the office to third class.

The provision relating to advance in grades of clerks and carriers and railway postal clerks is included, but limited to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919. Provision is also made that substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks and carriers shall be paid at the rate of 40 cents per hour, instead of 35 cents and 40 cents at present, making the rate uniform.

On amendment 53: Amendment 53 extends to watchmen, messengers, and laborers in first and second class post offices, and to railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer clerks the privileges of the 8-in-10-hour law, and also extends to railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices the privileges of compensatory time as now provided for clerks and carriers who work under the same conditions. The provision in the amendment extending compensatory time to assistant postmasters and supervisory employees is stricken out.

On amendment 54: Amendment 54 lodges with the Postmaster General the authority to investigate conditions arising from contracts on star route, screen wagon, and other vehicle service, and contracts for envelopes, blanks, and blank books, and the Official Postal Guide entered into prior to June 30, 1917, with a view to determining whether or not any adjustment should be made in the contracts due to the increased cost for materials or services because of the war, and whether the facts disclose the necessity to adjust the same for materials or services to be furnished after the approval of this act. With the consent of the contractor and his bondsmen the Postmaster General may cancel such contracts.

On amendment 55: Amendment 55 makes effective to certain employees in the Post Office Department the 5 and 10 per cent increase provided in the present appropriation bill which, by reason of construction, is denied them, and is identical with a similar provision which has heretofore passed the House.

On amendment 56: Amendment 56 permits the Postmaster General to accept liberty bonds in lieu of corporate or personal surety for contractors, officers, and employees in the Postal Service, and is identical with a similar provision which has heretofore passed the House.

On amendment 57: Amendment 57 relates to the same subject matter contained in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and permits experimentation by the Postmaster General in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities as he may select. The sum of $300,000 is made available out of unexpended appropriations for the Postal Service for the purpose of such experimentation, and direction is given that results shall be reported to Congress.

On amendment 58: Amendment 58 is almost identical with a similar provision in H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, and permits the Secretary of War to turn over to the Postmaster General, without charge, such aeroplanes and automobiles or parts thereof as are unsuitable for the War Department but suitable for the Postal Service.

On amendment 59: Amendment 59 authorizes employees and substitute employees of the Postal Service who enter the military or naval service to be restored after their honorable discharge from such service to the positions which they formerly occupied in the Postal Service at the salary to which they would have been promoted, provided they are physically and mentally qualified. The provision in the Senate amendment which permitted members of the immediate family of such employee or others connected with the expeditionary forces in Europe to mail certain packages is stricken out.

On amendment 60: Amendment 60 proposed by the Senate is stricken out.

On amendment 61: Amendment 61 permits the Postmaster General to adjust claims of postmasters for loss by fire, burglary, or other cause, of war savings stamps and thrift stamps, etc., which under the law they are required to keep on hand.

On amendment 62: Amendment 62 repeals existing law authorizing the payment of $5 to postmasters for each recruit secured and accepted in the Army, Navy, or Marine Service.

On amendments 63 and 64: Amendments 63 and 64 are the same as sections 9 and 10 of H. R. 9414, which has heretofore passed the House, increasing the amount any one person may deposit in a postal savings bank from $1,000 with interest and $1,000 without interest, as provided under present law, to $2,500 with interest. The provision as passed the House was for $3,000 with interest.

Amendment 64 permits the purchase of postal savings stamps in denominations of 10 cents, to be affixed to a card, and when it amounts to $1 may be deposited as a postal savings account or redeemed in cash.

On amendment 65: Amendment 65 is a clerical one, made necessary by the addition of certain sections to the bill.

On amendment 23: Amendment 23 relates to the purchase of the pneumatic-tube mail service. The conferees have been unable to agree respecting the provisions of this amendment.

JOHN A. MOON,
THOMAS M. BELL,
A. B. ROUSE,
HALVOR STEENERSON,
MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for an hour.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill went to the Senate it was clear of all legislation except that appropriate on a Post Office appropriation bill. It carried a little over or about $332,000,000 for the Postal Service. The bill was passed in this House in December last. Subsequent to its passage the House passed the bill known as H. R. 9414, which contained a number of provisions for changes in the postal laws and for the increase of salaries of postal officials. That bill is also pending in the Senate. The Senate has not deemed it wise to take up the latter bill, but it has incorporated as riders on the Post Office appropriation bill nearly all the provisions of the bill H. R. 9414, which has passed the House. Therefore the Senate amendments for the most part are not new to the House, the House having previously passed upon the questions which now constitute the Senate amendment and acted favorably on them in the bill to which I have referred. There are 65 amendments made by the Senate to this bill.

A large proportion of them, however, are due to the increases of the salaries necessary to be carried in the bill after the increase determined upon by the Senate as originally provided in House bill 9414. So the material questions between the House and the Senate have resolved themselves down practically to one question. In other words, Senate amendments thereto have heretofore been passed upon favorably by the House for the greater part, but the Senate has placed upon this bill one amendment which the House conferees have not been able to agree to and from which the Senate conferees do not recede, and that is the amendment in reference to the purchase of the pneumatic tubes. I shall not address myself to that amendment now, which will be the main question of contention here, but later on in this debate before its close I desire to express the views of the majority of the conferees of the House upon that question. I only for a few moments now desire to call the attention of the House to the other legislation that is on this bill. A Senate amendment provides for 20 per cent increase of rural carriers. It also provides for $24 per mile for each mile over the standard mile of 24 per annum as an addition to the salary. That is about the attitude the House took upon that question. A large majority of both bodies have favored that disposition of the rural-carrier question, and while I acquiesce in the views expressed by the majority—it is the best, perhaps, we can do now—I can not refrain from the suggestion that perhaps these increases under all the circumstances are a little high, that we are going too fast in the increase of salaries of officials, particularly at a time when the Government is so much in need of money to carry on the great war in which we are engaged. It would seem to me that all officials ought to make some sacrifices along these lines rather than demands for higher pay. I have thought that 15 per cent, which would be a saving of several million dollars over the present figure, would have been liberal under the circumstances, but I enter no protest against the judgment of the majority upon that question. It is, perhaps, the duty of a chairman of a committee to express not only the will of the committee he represents, but it is not out of the way for him to express as an individual Representative in the House his own views, and to admonish, if it amounts to anything, that we cease to spend the public money for great increases in the salaries of officials. I know that the times are such that the cost of living is much greater than it has been heretofore, and that we must meet that demand because we want to give adequate pay to public servants, but this is a time when we should proceed with great care. Year in and year out increase has come regardless of the rights of the American people, regardless of the enormous tax that is imposed upon them for the administration of the affairs of Government.

We have also provided for a reclassification of the city carriers and postal clerks entering into service at the figure of $200 in advance of that which they have had heretofore, and that is the extent of the compensation that they will have under the present law; that is, all will have an annual $200 additional compensation. We have also provided for the railway mail clerks a very proper income in pay, because those men perform a very intelligent and hazardous service for the public. We have made some provision for increased allowance of third-class post offices. We have provided for an increase in pay of fourth-class postmasters. There are quite a number of those officers. Under the present law they get 100 per cent on the first $50 the first quarter as compensation. They get the other compensation provided in the statute. This bill does not interfere with the compensation except in two particulars—we give them 100 per cent on the first $80 the first quarter instead of the first $50, and all under $50; that is, if their salary per annum is under $50 they get an increase of 20 per cent.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I will.

Mr. QUIN. Did the Senate in any wise change the House provision of fourth-class post offices so far as increase in pay is concerned?

Mr. MOON. Yes; the conferees changed to the position I am now stating. This provision is the conference provision on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. Now, we have thousands of these fourth-class post offices. Many of them are useless, and it does seem to me the time ought to come soon, if this Rural Delivery Service must be continued and extended and expense increased, that we ought to abolish a large majority of these offices and save millions of dollars of money annually now used in supporting them.

Again, under the conference we provided for the war aeroplanes for the carrying of mail, as provided in the bill H. R. 9014. We have also provided for the motor-truck service to the country, as provided. You gentlemen are all familiar with that discussion on the House bill. That is one of the amendments to this bill. We have provided that liberty bonds may be taken as security by the Government for the faithful performance of the duties of officials. We have also provided for an increase in the amount of noninterest-bearing deposits in postal savings banks to $2,500.

There are a number of other smaller matters. One authorized the Postmaster General to readjust the contracts of star-route contractors and screen-wagon contractors, and the contract for the furnishing of envelopes and supplies to the department, so as to give them a proper compensation for the service that they are performing. But the provision is not retroactive. It is from and after the passage of this bill, and it applies alone to those contracts entered into previous to the end of the last fiscal year.

Now, you have heard the reading of the statement in lieu of the report, and the adjustment by the conferees of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and I will not detain you with any further explanation of the bill, because all of its features evidently appeal to you. As I said in the beginning, at the close of this debate I want to show the House, if it is possible for me to do so, why, from an economical, a legal, and a moral standpoint, we ought not to agree to the Senate amendment No. 23, that provides for the purchase of the pneumatic tubes.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for an hour and a half.

Mr. MADDEN. Before the gentleman from Minnesota takes the floor, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if I may interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MOON. Gladly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it the intention to adopt the report of the conferees where the agreement is unanimous before we enter into the other?

Mr. MOON. No; it is immaterial. That can be done at the end of the debate, or, if there will be no objection to it, and there seems to be none, I would ask the Speaker to put the question on the adoption of the report, and the debate can then apply to section 23 alone.

Mr. STEENERSON. There has been no motion made yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks the adoption of this conference report——

Mr. MADDEN. Except as to amendment 23.

The SPEAKER. Except as to amendment 23.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. In the previous appropriation bill there was an item of something like $2,000,000 for envelopes that was not provided for. Some contractor had asked a remuneration for that amount. Is that provided for in this bill?

Mr. MOON. That is not in this bill, except in a general way. All contracts are subject to readjustment at the discretion of the department.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is clause——

Mr. MOON. That is covered by the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask some questions in order to secure information before we vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN. I want to know what provision is made in the report in reference to the increased compensation of postmasters and clerks in offices of second class?

Mr. MOON. I perhaps ought to have stated it, but I assumed the gentleman had read the report. All supervisory officials over $2,200 have an increased compensation of 10 per cent; assistant postmasters 5 per cent.

Mr. LARSEN. That applies to assistant postmasters where the compensation is in excess of $2,200?

Mr. MOON. It applies to them all.

Mr. LARSEN. Suppose his compensation is, say, $1,500, what would be his increase?

Mr. MOON. Five per cent of that amount.

Mr. LARSEN. Now, does that apply also to clerks in the various post offices?

Mr. MOON. Where the clerks have a percentage increase and are supervisory in their nature. I see what the gentleman is getting at, I think. There is no provision there by which a clerk occupying a supervisory position would obtain any better salary than the assistant postmaster.

Mr. LARSEN. Now the increased compensation is allowed to village and city mail carriers?

Mr. MOON. The compensation of the village mail carrier is now paid out of a lump sum and is regulated by the department. They have a right to fix it according to the conditions existing in the service. They have been paying $60 a month, I believe, in the small villages.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will permit, it is 20 per cent increase for the villages.

Mr. MOON. Yes; but the regular pay may be increased.

Mr. LARSEN. And again——

Mr. MOON. I do not care to be catechized too much about a thing that you can understand in two minutes by reading the report.

Mr. LARSEN. I understand we are to be called on to vote on the question, and if we are I want to have the opportunity to vote intelligently. I have not read the report.

Mr. MOON. The statement was read to the House a few moments ago on all those matters.

Mr. LARSEN. I think I can get through with the gentleman in a minute.

Mr. MOON. Then I think I shall have to submit.

Mr. LARSEN. I asked a moment ago not only in reference to village carriers but city carriers.

Mr. MOON. The carriers of cities are classified, and they are getting an increase under the bill that amounts to about $200 a year.

Mr. LARSEN. The point I wanted information on was as to the following:

> The salaries of assistant postmasters and clerks and carriers in first and second class post offices, railway postal clerk from grade 1 to grade 10, inclusive, and supervisory officials, shall be increased not more than $200 during the next fiscal year.

Now, that is what I wanted to know about. Is it in the discretion of anybody to say what they ought to get, or do they get an increase of $200 or a certain per cent?

Mr. MOON. They get $200. The gentleman will observe under the reclassification, unless the limitation had been put there, as the result of an automatic promotion it might have been $300.

Mr. LARSEN. Does that apply to the assistant postmasters, too?

Mr. MOON. They get 5 per cent increase.

Now, I decline to yield further.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this report gives in some degree the aid that this Government has long owed its postal employees. It provides a fairer compensation for the fourth-class postmasters, the rural carriers, and the postal employees. There are no more faithful employees in any line of the Government service than those who carry on the vast Postal System. Efficient, loyal, and hard working, for years they have given their time and talents in building up the greatest Postal System in the world. Whether they are postmasters or employees in a first, second, third, or fourth class office, rural carriers, or railway mail clerks, because of the peculiar service they render they must necessarily study and train themselves, undergoing in some cases hazardous risks and in other cases serving under most unfavorable conditions.

In such positions experience and training qualify each individual to make the whole system a greater benefit to all the people. In this legislation there is every reason why we should, and no reason why we should not, grant this increased compensation to these employees. When the bill was before the House I took occasion to lay especial stress in behalf of the rural carriers of the country. I want to say to-day that the compensation provided for by this bill, through a reclassification and increase in compensation, while extending some relief to these employees, does not meet the demand of present-day conditions. If four years ago, as a postal employee in one of the cities of this country, a man of family received $2 a day, and it cost $1.75 a day to pay his rent and other necessary expenses incident to the cost of living, and we should grant him through the provisions of this bill $3 a day, and it should now cost $2.75 a day to live, we have not provided an increase in compensation for him. In looking over the Bureau of Labor statistics the other day I was struck by the detail of retail prices of commodities for 1907, compared with present-day prices. I was surprised to note that in 1907 in cities $1 would purchase 7.9 pounds of lard, and to-day it will only purchase 2.9 pounds; that in 1907, $1 would purchase 12.7 quarts of milk, and to-day it will only purchase 7 quarts; that in 1907, $1 would purchase a 24-pound sack of flour, and to-day it will only purchase a 12-pound sack; that in 1907, $1 would purchase 40 pounds of corn meal, and to-day it will only purchase 10 pounds. In 1907, $1 would purchase 17.2 pounds of sugar, and to-day it will only purchase 10 pounds. In 1907 for $1 one could purchase 6.7 pounds of round steak, and to-day he can only purchase 2.9 pounds for this amount.

And so it is, all down the line; rents have increased, foodstuffs have increased, the cost of living in every way has increased; and although, in some degree, we have provided for a measure of increase in compensation, in my opinion we have not yet met the unusual, unparalleled, unprecedented conditions with which the postal employees and the laboring men generally throughout the country who work at a small salary or at a small hire are compelled to face. It is to be hoped that this tardy recognition, this small increase, will in a way influence these loyal employees of the Federal Government throughout the country to retain their present positions and encourage them by the realization that their Government, through this body, appreciates the splendid service they are rendering it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Merely to get this matter straight. I want to reserve the right to object in order to inquire if the passage of this motion means that the conference report is to be agreed to in all parts except the pneumatic tube, and that that is the only thing left to contend over?

The SPEAKER. It takes in everything except the question that the conferees did not concur on. The Chair understands that there is only one thing in disagreement, and that is this tube business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the only matter in dispute?

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands—amendment No. 23. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for one hour and a half.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this pneumatic-tube provision was inserted by the Senate in pursuance of the recommendation of the Pneumatic Tube Commission. It has never been before the House. You will recall that the Post Office appropriation bill, when it passed the House, had no legislative provisions in it. The estimates did not cover the pneumatic-tube service, so that that was omitted, and it was not in order to put in anything about it. Hence this is an original provision, so far as this House is concerned.

The recommendation of the Pneumatic Tube Commission, based to some extent upon the report of Stone & Webster, the consulting engineers employed by the commission, is embodied in Senate amendment No. 23.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to announce that I will proceed for 20 minutes without interruption. Then I will yield.

The provision is in substance that the Government is to take over these pneumatic tubes at a price not exceeding $4,432,000 to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that in fixing that price which the Government is to pay the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take into consideration the nature and character of the title of the tube companies. The reason for that provision is that some of these tube companies have concessions from the localities where they are located. For instance, at Chicago it expires in five years, at which time the whole thing reverts to the city government, and there are certain limitations on the franchises in New York and Boston and Philadelphia which it is not necessary to go into. But this clause in the Senate amendment is sufficient to cover the objection made on the part of the department that we are paying for a title that is not any good, because the nature and the length of the tenure, when it expires, will all be taken into consideration. But the amendment fixes an amount which is in accordance with the estimates of Mr. Fry, the engineer of the Treasury Department, who has 20 years' experience in making valuations of this kind. He was employed by the Hoke Smith Tube Commission in 1916, and made a valuation as to what it would cost to reproduce these tubes and place them where they are, and that, of course, was on a valuation that is much lower. It could not be done for that amount now. It would probably be 50 or 100 per cent higher if it were to be done now.

The annual appropriation heretofore has been $976,000 a year, which is equivalent to $17,000 per mile of the tubes. In consideration of that rental the tube companies have operated them. They have established their own power stations, and they have some 275 to 300 employees to do the work. They furnish the service complete.

The proposition here is to have the Government take over the tubes and operate them itself. The amount of the appropriations provided for is just exactly the same as the appropriation that we carried for 10 years in the bill—$976,000—but it is proposed to amortize the cost of the tubes by the difference between the old rental and what it will cost the Government to operate the tubes. Under that estimate in 10 years the tubes will be paid for out of exactly the same appropriation as has been made for 10 years past to pay for the tube service.

Now, there has been a great deal of controversy about this service. When it was proposed, after investigation by a departmental commission in 1916, to abandon the service, hearings were held before the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate, and there was a universal protest from Philadelphia, New York, St. Louis, Chicago, and elsewhere, where these tubes were operated, against the abandonment. They protested against it as delaying the mail; and it being the universal opinion of the people who used this service and paid the postage, the Senate committee and the House committee and the House and Senate agreed to continue this service for one year, and in the meantime appointed this tube commission, consisting of three Senators and three Representatives. Senator BANKHEAD, of Alabaha; Senator HARDWICK, of Georgia; and Senator WEEKS, of Massachusetts; and Mr. BELL, of Georgia, and Mr. ROUSE, of Kentucky, and myself constituted this commission.

We went to work as best we could and spent weeks in examining into these matters, and held hearings in all these cities, and visited them all. Of course we supposed that when the dispute between the department and these cities about this service was referred to the tube commission, which was created by law—a law signed by the President—that that should have some sort of effect; that the tube commission was a sort of tribunal authorized to settle the dispute between the department and the people who desired the service, and we went to work in good faith to make a report as to the quality of the service, whether it expedited the mail, whether it was safe, and whether it was worth the money. And while we were considering that question the department—while the question was pending before the tube commission—issued its annual report, in which it condemned the whole service and said it was not worth anything and that it should be discarded, thereby contradicting the report of the year before, where, basing their statement on the reports of their own experts, they recommended that the tube service should be continued in New York from Forty-second Street down, a distance of more than 13 miles, and came before the Post Office Committee of the House and asked for an appropriation to continue the New York tube service.

Now, if, as they have lately claimed, the tube service is unsafe, if it damages the mail, if it does not expedite the mail, if it is not efficient, why in the world did these same experts, that are held up to us as the only men who know anything about the business, recommend the continuance of the tube service in New York City?

There is an area in that congested city that is more crowded than any other city in the world. Take Fifth Avenue, they say, from Forty-second Street. Mr. Myers, the chief of traffic police, says from Fifty-fifth Street down, or on Broadway, there are more foot passengers and more vehicles passing than in any other place in the world. Even in the city of London, around Trafalgar Square, or the Strand, or Pall Mall, or Piccadilly, or anywhere, you can not find any such crowded condition as you find in this congested district in the city of New York.

A year and a half ago these experts recommended that the tube service be continued there. But now they come around and say that it is not worth anything, that it is junk, that it is no good, and should be abandoned everywhere. They wanted to put in a service that is unsafe, slow, unreliable, in the most thickly populated section in the world. They have criticized the tube commission for not paying sufficient heed to postal experts. This subject is city transportation. It is a subject that must be learned from actual experience and observation. Mr. Koons, Mr. Gardner, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Ryan, and Mr. Mullen were post-office inspectors. It has been their duty to ferret out crime. They were detectives. Their work in no way qualified them as experts in this matter. The only man on the commission who had had any experience in city transportation was Mr. Ryan, who for a short time had been superintendent of mails in Philadelphia. Mr. Gardner, would not sign the report—refused to sign it—disagreed with the rest. These other three inspectors have claimed that they knew all about the subject, and that nobody else knew anything about it, and they have asked Congress to take on faith what they say about it. Evidently some people do. The criticism that has been made upon the tube commission—that they did not consider the statements of the department—is unfounded. The commission had before it the testimony of these experts before the House committee and the Senate committee.

Before the House committee the learned lawyer from Boston, Mr. Whipple, cross-examined the experts, and they did not come out so very well. The secretary of the tube commission invited the department to submit their statements in writing, which they did, and those statements were printed in the report. All they had to say was printed without cross-examination. The object of cross-examination is to weaken the evidence of the witness. Yet they complain because we did not weaken the evidence of their experts by cross-examining them! We are said to have omitted to call postal experts. How can you get postal experts outside of the Post Office Department? You must either take men who have been discharged or who have left the service. But there are business men who know a good deal about postal matters. The commission went to New York and they heard 40 or 50 of the leading business men and representatives of business organizations, and, fortunately, we were able to get the man who, in my opinion, is the ablest postal expert on this subject that there is in the United States—Mr. Follmer. Mr. Follmer started in as an errand boy in the Postal Service, served 30 years, and advanced to be superintendent of delivery in the great city of New York. He had charge of the tube service, and when the department last year proposed to change the tube service and to institute a Government-owned automobile service he was the man in the New York post office who was selected to lay out the schedules and the lines to operate the new automobile service. That shows that he was recognized by the department to be the most skilled man they had, so far as New York was concerned, and he did lay out those schedules and those routes. About six or eight months ago he was offered a position with the Bankers' Trust Co. to look after their mail. The Bankers' Trust Co., one of the biggest financial institutions in the country, have very important financial mail to take care of, and they employed Mr. Follmer, so that at the time he was called before the commission he was not connected with the Postal Service and was free to give his opinion. I will insert his testimony in the RECORD.

We also had before us the testimony of ex-Postmaster Morgan, of New York, given before the House committee at the hearing a year ago. I will insert that also in the RECORD. He strongly favored the continuance of the tube service. He was a real expert.

This testimony answers every objection that has been made by these claimed experts, who simply know by observation or information; but this is the testimony of a man who knew by actual experience, who had had charge of the tube service. He says there is less in the way of accidents, less damage to the mail, and greater expedition of the mail by the tube than by automobile, and it expedites the mail. That is a valuable thing in a large city like that, where $600,000,000 goes through the clearing house every day, and 90 per cent of that goes through the mails. If you send a check for $1,000,000 to a bank, the customer is credited with it, and it draws interest from the time the mail is delivered and the envelope opened and the check placed to his credit. When it is delayed, the loss amounts to a great deal. The financial business of this country is so important that if you should delay the mail completely for one day throughout the year the loss of interest on the money that goes through the banks and the clearing houses would be ten times as much as the whole cost of the Postal Service. It would be $10,000,000 a day, because it amounts to over $300,000,000,000 in a year, or $1,000,000,000 a day. Now, that affects the cost of living. If you buy a quantity of grain and pay for it with a check, if it takes longer to do that business the expense of transacting the business is charged up in interest and the consumer has to pay it. That is the reason why every business man says that if you delay the first-class mail you touch the very nerves of business life. If you delay the financial transactions of this country, you delay the consummation of trade, and thereby increase the cost of living a great many times more than the whole Postal Service costs.

The work of the post office in the cities can be divided into three classes. One part of the work is performed by the clerks who sort and distribute the mail, another is performed by the carriers who collect and deliver the mail, and the third is the transportation of the mail between the post office and the branch post office, and between the branch post office and the railroad station and the wharf, or wherever it is dispatched outside. That is what is called the city transportaion as distinguished from the city delivery and the clerk hire. These are carried in different items in the appropriation and have been for years and years.

The work of city transportation is done either by vehicles on the surface or by pneumatic tubes underground. Originally the vehicle transportation was a contract service and was appropriated for under the heading, "Horse-hire allowance and renting of vehicles," but two years ago this item was broadened so as to include purchase of automobiles and government operation, and this has been gradually substituted for the contract screen-wagon service in the principal cities, and it is the announced policy of the department to make this substitution general. Ten years ago the entire expense of the screen-wagon service was between $700,000 and $800,000 per annum. After the work of collection and delivery of heavy parcels was merged in this service in 1915 the expenditure was only $2,056,459. Since then the vehicular transportation expense has increased threefold, as I will show.

I want to call your attention to this fact, because if we are speaking of the pneumatic-tube service from the point of economy it has a bearing.

I might say right here that for a long time there had been a fight between the two rival services. Because they were rivals the screen-wagon contractors entered into a combination to prevent bidding, and a man by the name of Cassidy had bribed the officials of the post office in New York to keep away from the department the report of delays by automobile service. They had substituted automobiles for the horse-drawn wagon service. Cassidy was finally prosecuted by the department and went to the penitentiary. They say in a report that they found the missing papers and fined him from the amount allowed on the contract $50,000. You know that the fines run from $1 up to $50 for each delay, so that if they fined a screen-wagon service in New York City $50,000 it shows that that year it was certainly poor service, or there would not have been so many delays.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman please tell us how the mail is damaged and delayed in the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. STEENERSON. The fact is Mr. Follmer states that the damage is infinitesimal, but once in a while when the mail is placed in the carrier, like a cartridge in an 8-inch cannon, you put the letters in and turn a crank to fasten the lid. Some careless clerk may not fasten it properly, and in going up hill and down letters might leak out, and when the next cartridge comes along the mail is shoved before it. Mr. Koons showed a cartridge and how the mail might be damaged in that way. But the report up to the time the tube commission was appointed was favorable, and Mr. Follmer states that the damage was infinitesimal. So did other witnesses.

Mr. LAZARO. How about the delays?

Mr. STEENERSON. And the delays were infinitesimal. Lately the department, having become hostile to the pneumatic-tube service, has gathered a lot of statistics to show that it is to the contrary; but that is unfair. In Chicago they are building railroad terminals, and they have had to dig up the basement and the tubes had to be moved, and they are charging all the delays for the time that the tubes are being moved to the pneumatic-tube service. That is not fair. It really makes the case stronger for the service than it was before.

Stone & Webster, engineers, were employed by the tube commission and paid $10,000 for services to examine this as a postal device—whether it was efficient or not—and they had engineers there and sent test letters and examined it for weeks. They made a thorough examination, and their report goes into details about everything. Their report was that it was an efficient mechanism and that it had rendered good service and had expedited the mail, and was safer than any other means of transportation. Everybody knows, as Mr. Follmer points out, that you can not transport mail without danger. An automobile may collide with another; the mail may be spilled out in the rain and get damp; the transportation may be stalled in a snowstorm, and other delays. The pneumatic tube is as safe a method of transporting the mail as has ever been devised, and it expedites first-class mail. It carries 27,000,000 letters daily, and expedites the delivery of three or four millions.

Now, as I was going to say, there was hostility between the department and the tubes for some reason. After they got rid of the private screen-wagon trucks in New York they instituted the Government-owned automobile service. They spent $300,000 or $400,000 for that service, and the same hostility that was exhibited by the screen-wagon contractors against the tubes is now exhibited by the department officials. It seems that they want to buy some automobiles—they want a complete automobile monopoly—and they want the tubes taken out. They inherit that hostility, and it seems that one service is desired to replace another rival service.

Now, about the expense of the automobile service. The post office officials came before the Post Office Committee for the last three years and said that they wanted to put in Government-owned and operated automobiles for screen-wagon service, because, they said, in New York they had a combination or monopoly that had bribed the officials. They said that the bonding companies that signed the surety bonds for the contractors practically dictated the price they should take the contracts for, and therefore this was the reason why the Government ought to own and operate this automobile service in the city transportation of the mail.

Three years ago the department asked for $5,650,000. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] examined them and wanted to know if they would submit a report of how many automobiles they bought. They said they would, but it has never been done. I inquired at the department the other day, and they sent me a price list of automobiles, to which I shall refer later.

Mr. LAZARO. Has the gentleman looked into the difference of the force of men needed to operate one as against the other?

Mr. STEENERSON. Not exactly. I have looked into the question of the expense.

The screen-wagon service, after it was combined with the parcel-post collection and delivery service, in 1914 carried an appropriation of $1,900,000. The next year, 1915, they estimated $2,300,000 and we expended only $2,056,459. In 1917, two years ago, because we are now soon entering upon the 1919 fiscal year, they asked for $5,565,000 and spent $5,495,000. If you will look at this bill you will find that the House passed the bill with $5,565,000. That was stated by Mr. Koons in the hearings to be the same as the year before, fiscal year 1918.

He said that they had put in the same amount. The committee asked him whether the department had not promised that when the Government owned and operated the automobile service it would reduce the expense of vehicular transportation; that it was cheaper than contract service. He said they did say so, and it was going to be a saving. He said: "We are saving now, because we are not asking for any more this year than we did the year before." We gave them $5,600,000. What happened? They went before the Senate committee. We passed the bill in December, before Christmas, and the bill went over to the Senate. They then made a supplemental estimate—for how much? How much did the bill carry? Look on page 12. It now carries $6,700,000—an increase of $735,000 since last December. That shows what the automobile service is costing, which they had said was going to be so cheap when the Government took it over. In the last three years the vehicular transporation has increased 250 per cent. Next fiscal year's estimate is $6,700,000, an increase of 300 per cent over what it was five years ago. This is the greatest increase that can be found in the whole service. Can you blame anyone for thinking that perhaps the economy that is promised by substituting automobiles for tube service will prove a failure? The following table shows the increase in expense of this service:

Year.	Estimate.	Appropriation.	Expenditures.
1913	$975,000.00	$1,400,000.00	[1] $1,288,293.01
1914	1,530,000.00	1,930,000.00	1,885,743.14
1915	2,300,000.00	2,300,000.00	2,056,459.43
1916	2,600,000.00	2,300,000.00	2,067,583.40
1917	5,565,000.00	5,565,000.00	5,495,282.00
1918	5,965,000.00	5,965,000.00	.....
1919	[2] 5,965,000.00	.....	.....

[1] Parcel post began in the last half of 1913.
[2] Supplemental estimate to the Senate has increased the amount to $6,700,000, which is the amount carried in the bill.

The Postmaster General has been fertile in postal reforms. You will remember that he proposed and succeeded in passing the space plan. You all remember how the chairman of the Post Office Committee chastised the House, both Republicans and Democrats, for refusing to put that provision on the Post Office appropriation bill two or three years ago on a rule. He said it would save $10,000,000 a year. The last report of the Post Office Department shows that for the same amount of transportation they would have paid $3,250,000 more than it would have cost under the weight plan, but they say they are going to save $7,000,000 in the future when they get the thing established. That is what they said about this automobile service. They are going to save something, but up to date there has been an increase. Instead of paying $2,300,000, as in 1914, we are to pay $6,700,000 in the next fiscal year. The postal reforms of this administration seem to have a similarity to, at least they remind one of, Pope's Essay on Man, "Man never is but always to be blessed." Burleson's postal reforms never are but always to be economical. [Applause and laughter.] They have promised economy over and over again, but it has never materialized. As an interesting comparison, since we are on this economy question, the tubes in 1916 represented 30 per cent of the total expense for city transportation of mail, 70 per cent being for vehicular transportation. In 1917 the tubes represented 14 per cent and the vehicles 86 per cent. Now the tubes constitute 13 per cent and the vehicles 87 per cent of the total city transportation of mail. If you keep on like this it will not take very long before you will have a cost in excess of the tubes. That expense has been stationary for ten years. Another claim is that this tube service is antiquated and obsolete. Another is that they always want to sell them. Well, if I should build a brick house upon your land and agree to furnish and keep it there for three years upon a certain rental and you were satisfied I would expect you to buy it, and as soon as the three years was up naturally I would want to sell, because it would not be worth anything if I had to move it.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I will ask if the commission ascertained the original price of these tubes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes; the American Audit Co., you will find in the report, showed that they had expended about $10,000,000 as an original investment. We have paid no regard to that, because it was only an element in the whole. These tubes are absolutely useless to anyone but the Government. You can not move them. Can you wonder at it that the people who have put $5,000,000 and $10,000,000 into these tubes, which are absolutely worthless unless used for mail carrying, are anxious to rent or sell them? If they sell them their troubles are over. These leases have been for 10 years, and a year or two before the lease expires naturally the owners are anxious to know their situation, because if the Government refuses to renew the lease or to buy them their property is absolutely worthless.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, we want to be fair. I regret my time is limited. I will yield if the gentleman will make it short.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman stated the audit company had valued this at $10,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not care anything about that. I am not having a dispute about that. The values are not in issue here. This provision gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to fix whatever value they think is right; we have not fixed it. But they say this is antiquated. Now, by "antiquated" they mean something that is no more in use. So we were curious, and so the commission was, to know whether tubes were used in other businesses. We sent an inquiry to the Western Union Telegraph Co., and they say they use more tubes than the whole Post Office Department. They have nearly 100 miles of tubes and use them every day. Then we asked the Treasury Department of the United States, which has a tube exactly like the Post Office tube between the customhouse and the appraiser's stores, and they wrote a letter, and I will put it in the RECORD, recommending it most highly and saying that they could not get along without it. The Navy Department uses a pneumatic tube, and says it is very satisfactory. I saw in the papers Mr. Schwab insists they must have a pneumatic tube extended out to the navy yard. I do not wonder at it. How is it about business houses? The Bankers Trust Co., I believe, use 8 or 9 miles of tubes, and they recommend them very highly. Sears, Roebuck & Co. use more than 12 miles of tube, and they recommend them very highly. The Westinghouse Co. uses a great many miles of tube. Altman Co., New York——

A MEMBER. How large are those tubes?

Mr. STEENERSON. Some of these tubes I have mentioned are 4 inches, some 3½, some 6, and some 8, as big as the postal tubes. Here is a list of the leading business houses of the United States whose success has been phenomenal who can not be said to be addicted to the use of antiquated and obsolete methods, and they are all using tubes:

B. Altman & Co., New York.
Bankers Trust Co., New York.
General Electric Co., Schenectady, N. Y.
R. H. Macy & Co., New York.
National Cloak & Suit Co., New York.
New York Stock Exchange, New York.
Sears, Roebuck & Co., New York.
Montgomery Ward & Co.
Treasury Department, United States Customs Service, New York.
Winchester Repeating Arms Co., New Haven, Conn.

Therefore the charge that this is antiquated and obsolete is absolutely without foundation, as are all the charges in the opinion of the commission. These are questions of facts. The records show that the tubes expedite the first-class mail, which they are intended to carry, and they expedite the second-class mail. The financial newspapers in New York are sent by tube. At certain periods of the year automobiles will not operate, as in case of a snowstorm; on ice they skid, and there are accidents. Several days in New York and Boston even last year the automobiles were out of commission and inefficient, and the automobiles in Chicago could not operate to their full capacity on account of storms. Everybody knows that. They say if it had not been for the tube service first-class mail would have been seriously delayed.

Now, is it not strange that in this time of war you are going to compel the factories to furnish two or three or four hundred extra motor trucks and discard a utility that has proven to be efficient? Why, we read in the papers that the city of New York is in darkness for fear of bombardment from the sky by flying machines dropping bombs, and shells from hostile ships and submarines and warships above the water. What would you do with these automobile trucks carrying tons and tons in the darkness? Why, Mr. Follmer testified under oath before the tube commission that they had delayed the daily mail on account of fog, that the ferries were delayed because they could not see anything in the fog in New York, and here, right in the midst of war, when they put the city in darkness, you are going to destroy and discontinue the only safe method of transmitting the first-class mail, that is the very blood that circulates in the business life of the Nation.

And for what? To save, some say, $300,000 a year, and Stone & Webster estimated it at $114,000 a year; for that you are going to imperil the safety of the financial mail that goes into these large cities where the clearings run into nearly a billion of dollars a day. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman stated that the fogs interfered with the transmission of the mails. Do I understand then that the fogs would not interfere with the transmission of the mail by the tube system?

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems to me that question has its own answer, and I decline to yield further. I say, No, it does not interfere with the transmission by tube and that settles it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JUUL. Is there a tube system under the river, that is the question?

Mr. STEENERSON. The fog does not go underground in New York or Chicago, either, and it does not interfere in the slightest degree with the transmission of the mail by the pneumatic-tube service. The fog has delayed and darkness has delayed the transmission of mail by vehicles on the face of the earth, and if the gentleman is not willing to take my word for it he will have to excuse me. I am not going to devote any time to discuss the question further.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman answer me this, Is there a tube system under the river? I am asking the gentleman in good faith.

Mr. STEENERSON. Over the river and under the river.

Mr. JUUL. That is the question. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thought the gentleman knew that. I will take the gentleman to New York and show him the tube on the bridge across the big river, and fog never hurts letters passing through that tube. For these reasons, I repeat, they say, for the purpose of saving all the way from $100,000 to $300,000, they are going to destroy this service. Why? Because some self-constituted alleged experts in the department here have condemned it. The men who use the tubes, the business men of New York, the business men of Philadelphia, the business men of Chicago, the business men of Boston and St. Louis, who pay for the tube service—and in those cities there are $100,000,000 of postal revenue—say it is valuable, but the postal experts say, "You business men do not know anything about it; you are children; you do not know your own interest; you must have faith in us."

The Merchants' Association of New York made a study of this. They have gone before the committee and complained of alleged postal reforms that have been inaugurated by this administration.

They have shown that the first-class mail is delayed by the space plan and mixed up with parcels. They have come out strongly in favor of the tube service; but the experts say, "You do not know your own business. Let us exercise a paternal care and responsibility for your welfare, you small children, in Chicago, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, and let us do what we think is best for you, and we will abolish the tubes so that we can pay $1,500,000 a year for automobiles."

There is something funny about buying automobiles. I will put in the RECORD that a man named Skelly, a great expert on automobiles, resigned from the White Co., and the civil-service rules were suspended; over the protest of the Civil Service Commission he was appointed a post-office inspector and detailed to automobiles. And since he has been in the office his former employers have sold automobiles to a greater extent than any of their rivals. I will put in the price list that the department gave me:

It is a most wonderful record. They had an investigation of this matter over in the Senate, where they passed a resolution in 1914, and the Post Office Department answered that they did not give the contract to the lowest bidder, but that they gave it to the White machine because it was the best machine. What was the use of advertising then? There were 18 lower bids. I also have the affidavit of Mr. Gardner, who was discharged, or at least resigned and his resignation accepted, because he could not agree to the Pneumatic Tube Commission's report. He was an expert and a member of the commission. He said it was a foregone conclusion that they wanted to buy automobiles and abolish the tubes. Here are the prices of some of them. The price of the White is $3,980. These men that have shown such profligacy—and I hope it is nothing worse—in spending public money for automobiles say they want to save two or three hundred thousand dollars in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago by abolishing the tubes. But they say at the same time that the automobile service that the Government has charge of has increased in cost $735,000 over what they spent last year. Now, they do not claim that there has been any growth in the Post Office Department beyond the ordinary increase of 5 or 6 per cent, but they say chauffeurs' salaries have gone up, and the price of gasoline and of repairs and the rent of garages have gone up.

Everybody admits the tube service is more expensive than automobile service, but it is faster, and first-class mail pays a profit, so it ought to be expedited. The tube commission decided that in their opinion this service should be continued on these terms, and for that reason when the time comes to carry out the Senate amendment I will move to concur in the amendment and change the date when the Interstate Commerce Commission shall report from July to November.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. STEENERSON. How much time have I used?

Tht SPEAKER pro tempore. Forty-five minutes.

Mr. LAZARO. Will you mind telling us something about the origin of this tube service and the amount invested and the percentage of mail carried?

Mr. STEENERSON. It has been about 30 years since they first started in Philadelphia, and the first tube was built in Boston, for a distance of 6 miles, to carry merchandise, and then it was abandoned for that purpose and was changed to an 8-inch tube, and that has been used in that way. All the other tubes have been built for the express purpose of carrying the mail, and they have been built of the size designated by the Government experts—namely, 8-inch.

Mr. MOON. I want to say to the gentleman there, that the Post Office Department says it never made any arrangements with anybody to build any tube, and that they are under no legal or moral obligations, and no living man can show it.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman in one sense is correct. But they will not deny, and the records show, that the tubes, as they designed them, were 8-inch tubes. They were satisfactory. They did not want them larger. They first talked about 24 inches and 30 inches, but the Post Office Department decided that the 8-inch tube was the most practical size.

Mr. MOON. The Post Office Department has done no such thing, if they are to be trusted in their statements.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is not material. The record shows this, and I do not think the department denies it. It appears in the testimony. It is not my statement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was any one of these tubes built without the sanction and warrant of Congress?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; we appropriated the money. And it is like this: The men who proposed to build these tubes took the risk. It was the same way as I illustrated. If you put up a house on my land and I agree to pay you $100 a year for it, and it is perfectly satisfactory, if just out of meanness I refuse to buy and will not rent it, you have to move it away. I do not think Congress will act in that spirit. If it is an efficient postal facility, if it is safe, and expedites the mail, and renders good service, why should we fall back on the question that "There is no moral obligation upon us"?

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman has not answered as to the amount invested.

Mr. STEENERSON. The American Audit Co. was employed by the tube commission and also by the Hoke Smith commission, and continued down to date, and they show something like eight or ten million dollars invested in these tubes, but the tube commission only recommended a maximum price of $4,400,000.

Mr. LAZARO. And the percentage of mail carried?

Mr. STEENERSON. The percentage of mail? I think that in some towns they estimated 80 per cent of the first-class mail. I think that was in New York. It makes a good deal of difference as to the amount of mail. It depends upon the length of the tube. In St. Louis they have only 3 or 4 miles of tubes.

Mr. MOON. Is it not true that less than 12 per cent of the mails are carried by the tubes?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, there is no use in disputing that. The first-class mail constitutes between 12 and 15 per cent of the total mail. We are not talking about freight. That is not mail; that is freight. First-class mail, however, brings in more than 95 per cent of the revenue. As to first-class mail, Mr. Follmar said it carried 80 per cent of the first-class mail, and the more tubes you have the larger percentage of mail will be carried by them. Tubes are a facility to expedite the first-class mail, which requires speed and celerity and safety. It is so profitable that we can well afford to give it this facility. This administration seems to want to treat first-class mail like slow freight to save a few dollars. It will be poor economy; it will be waste.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The value or price to be paid for this system is to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. You are only giving to July 1, 1918?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am going to change that to November 1. I here print some of the evidence before the tube commission:

"Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that on your tour of inspection this afternoon you particularly observe conditions above and below Forty-third Street, because if you do so you will come to the conclusion that to cut off the service to-day we consider would be like stopping the circulation in your body at the waist. Supplementing the statement of Mr. De Berard, we will ask Mr. Follmer, of the Guaranty Trust Co., to state the utility of the pneumatic-tube service to his bank.

"The CHAIRMAN. Very well; you may proceed, Mr. Follmer.

"STATEMENT OF MR. GEORGE J. H. FOLLMER, OF THE GUARANTY TRUST CO., OF NEW YORK.

"Mr. FOLLMER. Gentlemen, the Guaranty Trust Co. is interested in an expeditious mail service to the same extent as the other business institutions represented before you. It is interested particularly in behalf of its thousands of customers and clients scattered throughout the country who profit by a prompt and efficient mail service. The Guaranty Trust Co. transacts a general domestic and foreign banking business, extends credit and pays interest on daily balances, finances shipments to or from the United States, investigates, examines, and underwrites bond issues, acts as trustee for individuals and corporations, also as transfer, fiscal, and disbursing agent, registrar and depositary for corporations that are organizing or reorganizing, or that are already established. Its business reaches out into all parts of the world. These are but a few of its functions, but give some idea of the extent to which it depends upon the mail service.

"I understand that because of my knowledge of the technical operation of the New York mail service, it is the desire of the Merchants' Association that I present my views as to whether the mails can be as expeditiously transported in New York City by motor wagons as by pneumatic tubes. My familiarity with this subject is based upon many years' experience in the New York postal service. During my connection with it I have prepared practically every one of the local mail transportation schedules in use to-day.

"Mr. STEENERSON. In what capacity?

"Mr. FOLLMER. As the assistant superintendent of mails of the New York post office.

"The CHAIRMAN. You ought to be able to tell us something.

"Mr. FOLLMER. I believe I can shed some light upon the matter which will prove to you the necessity for a continuance of the present pneumatic-tube service and for its extension to the Borough of The Bronx.

"I am not aware of the reasons upon which the Post Office Department bases its recommendations to curtail the service, but presume that the information upon which they are founded is the result of superficial investigation by individuals unfamiliar with the subject, and who have not had practical experience in the actual operation of the tube service, or else were prejudiced for reasons which do not appear.

"I believe it is absolutely impracticable to go back to the conditions existing prior to the establishment of the pneumatic-tube service, which was inaugurated in 1897. Before that time the mails were moved by means of elevated railway trains and horse wagons. The first-class mails were sent in pouches on the elevated railroad and the bulky matter by wagon. The number of pouches transported on the elevated railway was limited to eight on each trip. In those days there were about seven stations of the New York post office on the west side of the city between the general post office and the northerly limit of the elevated railroad service. If the pneumatic tubes should be eliminated, it would not be practicable to use the elevated railway or the subway, because the number of post-office stations along the line has increased to such an extent that the number of pouches to be transported on a trip would be greater than the railroad company could accommodate without seriously interfering with the passenger traffic, so that the only alternative would be to transport letters, as well as bulky mail, by automobile, which would result in delaying the letter mails.

"The New York post office has four great distributing centers, one of which is the general post office down town. Incoming mails are received there from Brooklyn, Staten Island, the Central Railroad of New Jersey, the Pennsylvania Railroad, local trains which arrive at Jersey City, the Erie Railroad, with its numerous branches, and the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad. These mails are assorted at the general post office for the various postal districts from which they are deliverable, and are dispatched at frequent intervals by pneumatic tube to the different postal stations. In the absence of tube service, the mails would have to be made up in separate pouches for each station and transported by automobile. There are 14 postal stations on the west side, namely, Stations A, O, Pennsylvania Terminal, Times Square, G, N, W, H, I, J, College, Hamilton Grange, M, and Washington Bridge—14 points on the west side for which pouches would have to be made up at the general post office. Therefore on each wagon trip it would be necessary to dispatch at least 28 pouches of letter mail from the initial point, 14 made up at the general post office and 14 made up at the Hudson Terminal Station, in addition to the bulky mail. Upon arrival of the wagon at Station A, the first point of call, 2 pouches and the bulky mail for A would be taken out, and 15 more pouches and such other mail as may be on hand loaded into the wagon. The wagon would then proceed northward from Station A with 45 pouches, plus the bulky mail, to the next point, which is Station O. Upon arrival at O the bags loaded into the wagon at Station A would have to be pushed aside or taken out so that the clerks could find the bags for Station O, dispatched from the Hudson Terminal, general post office, and Station A. This process would be repeated at each station at which the wagon calls, until it arrives at Station J. Obviously, the size of the wagons used would have to be greatly increased, and the time taken at each postal station in unloading, sorting, and reloading the bags would materially increase the time consumed in making the trip, with resultant delay to the mails.

"The present running time from the general post office to Station J of automobiles which carry the bulky mail is 2 hours and 30 minutes. This includes necessary stops en route, and is made as follows:

"General post office to Penn Terminal Station, about 1 hour and 20 minutes to transfer mail at Penn Terminal to the wagon going north, plus about 1 hour and 10 minutes from Penn Terminal to Station J. This time of 2 hours and 30 minutes would undoubtedly have to be increased if the letter mails were carried. The running time by pneumatic tube over the same route is 35 minutes. The difference of two hours represents the delay to which letters for Station J, dispatched from the general post office, would have to be subjected if automobiles were substituted for tube service, and there would be a proportionate delay to the mail for each one of the intermediate post-office stations.

"Mr. STEENERSON. That is, to One hundred and forty-fifth Street?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Station J is on One hundred and twenty-fifth Street. By automobile the running time, including stops and transfers, would be at least two and one-half hours. The same condition applies to the east side of the city, where the tube runs from the general post office via Station D, Madison Square, F, Grand Central, Y, K, U, to Station L at One hundred and twenty-fifth Street, in about 24 minutes, as against 1 hour and 40 minutes by automobile.

"The CHAIRMAN. The Post Office Department maintains—had you finished?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I have more information along these lines.

"The CHAIRMAN. I beg your pardon.

"Mr. FOLLMER. It is granted. About four years ago when the horse-wagon service, which then carried the bulky mail, was superseded by an automobile contract, new schedules of running time were prepared for the service between the post-office stations and the railroad stations. These schedules were based upon the contract running time of 9 to 12 miles per hour, the slower time being used in practically all cases. However, that speed could not be attained, owing to the congested condition of the streets, and it became necessary shortly after the automobile contract went into operation to reduce the speed to about 7 miles per hour. South of the general post office there is an automobile wagon circuit for bulky mail running from the general post office via Wall Street Station to Station P, covering the financial district, a district of 1 mile, where it became necessary to allow 14 minutes from the initial to the terminal point.

"Mr. STEENERSON. How long was the route?

"Mr. FOLLMER. The route is exactly 0.99 of a mile, and the automobile gives us no better service than was had with the old horse wagon. The density of street traffic in that district will not permit it. During a greater part of the day the same condition prevails through the entire business area of the city.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Do you make as good speed as an ordinary walk?

"Mr. FOLLMER. In certain sections they do not. Traffic will not permit it. The pneumatic tube does that service in three minutes.

"The contract running time of automobiles from the general post office to the Grand Central Station is 25 minutes, but the post office finds it necessary to allow the contractors 5 minutes additional, owing to the congested streets, so that 30 minutes is the present schedule time, which is no faster than the old horse wagon used 20 years ago. Mail bags arriving by automobile must reach the Grand Central Station at least 15 minutes before the leaving time of the trains, so that the departure will not be delayed. Outgoing letters sent from the Hudson Terminal, which is the big down-town distributing center for such mail, is dispatched to the Grand Central Station by tube and there inclosed in pouches, reaching the trains in a few minutes, so there is a saving there by the use of the pneumatic tubes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want to invite your attention to two contentions by the Post Office Department, because I think you are in a position to know. The Post Office Department contends, first, that at the present time the auto delivery of second-class mail is speedy enough to give a substantially prompt delivery of the letter mail—first-class mail—and that since we have to take the second class anyway in automobiles it is economical and better to consolidate them all and let the automobiles, since they must run, carry them. You do not agree?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; I do not agree with those contentions. The wagons would carry more bags then and more time would be needed at each stopping point to sort out the bags, and each postal station would receive the entire accumulation from everywhere on each trip, which would have to be assorted before it could be sent out by letter carriers, whereas with the tubes in operation the letters come in a continuous stream and letter carriers can go out and make their deliveries a few minutes after the last of the mail arrives.

"The CHAIRMAN. How much does that add to the volume, if in addition to the second and third class that they now carry they add the letter mail also?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I can not answer that question now, as I have not the statistics. It would, however, be necessary to perform many more wagon trips.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is an important point for us to find out.

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it is important for us to ascertain that?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I do. When we were preparing the data for the Post Office Department, on the 4th of March last, we did not know whether the pneumatic-tube service was to be discontinued or not, and we were obliged to prepare in advance a tentative wagon schedule.

"The CHAIRMAN. Were you then in the post office?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes; I was then in the post office, and we figured on at least a half million miles more per annum of automobile service, at a cost of over a quarter of a million of dollars.

"The CHAIRMAN. Would that not cost as much as the pneumatic service?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I would imagine so.

"Mr. STEENERSON. It would cost more? You say it costs a quarter of a million dollars more?

"Mr. FOLLMER. A quarter of a million dollars more under the present rate of pay—it is about 59 cents a mile on the down-town contract.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Substitute auto service for the pneumatic tubes?

"The CHAIRMAN. How many miles of tube service?

"Mr. STEENERSON. Twenty-six.

"Mr. FOLLMER. Twenty-nine miles of tube service.

"A VOICE. Twenty-eight.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is costing—28 times $17,000 is how much, somebody? About half a million dollars. So if you can replace this service under $250,000, that would be a saving of $250,000.

"Mr. FOLLMER. It would not be possible to save $200,000 if the best possible automobile service were provided.

"The CHAIRMAN. Now, do you agree with their contention that you would not slow up first-class mail too much to do that? You are with a great bank now, are you not, handling the mail of a great bank?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes; with the Guaranty Trust Co., of New York.

"The CHAIRMAN. Suppose they give you a half dozen deliveries a day by automobile, would that do?

"Mr. FOLLMER. That alone would not do. We call for the mail about every half hour, early in the morning, and in addition special-delivery letters are brought in by messenger throughout the day. Most of these letters are received by tube at the Wall Street Station, from which point delivery is made to the Guaranty Trust Co.

"The CHAIRMAN. You can do that still?

"Mr. FOLLMER. But we would not get as much mail and it would be received too late. We want as much mail as we can get in the morning and on each delivery, and by having this continuous flow of mail from the general post office, the Hudson Terminal, the Pennsylvania Terminal, and the Grand Central Station to the Wall Street post office, the mail constantly flowing down town, we are enabled to have it separated, sorted, and delivered to our different departments when the bank opens for business and to put through the clearing house before 10 o'clock the checks mailed by our customers, thereby giving them an additional day's interest on their deposits. We have a foreign department, a trust department, a bond department, and various other departments, and they all expect their first mail at 9 o'clock in the morning.

"The CHAIRMAN. And prompt enough service could be maintained by automobile?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; much of our mail, and particularly checks that go through the clearing house, would be delayed. That would be a disadvantage to us and to our customers.

"The CHAIRMAN. The department contends that at the post office and railroad stations the mail can be handled more efficiently by automobile than in this continuous flow in the tubes. Do you think that is true, as a practical employee of the post office?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; I do not. If the mail should reach the station at the last minute there would be delay in having the pouches separated for the trains, and the only way that could be overcome would be to have the wagon start earlier.

"The CHAIRMAN. And get there a little ahead?

"Mr. FOLLMER. And require the public to mail its letters earlier.

"Mr. MEAD. And how about in the wintertime, too, from November to April? How about the service between the pneumatic tube and automobile on a stormy day?

"Mr. FOLLMER. And also on foggy days, when the North River ferry service is disarranged?

"Mr. MEAD. Yes, sir.

"Mr. FOLLMER. I know positively that New York post office closes the mails which are dispatched by automobiles a half hour to an hour and a half earlier on foggy days and when the streets are slippery.

"The CHAIRMAN. When there are no pneumatic tubes?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Where there are no pneumatic tubes.

"A VOICE. Did he say a half million more miles of wagon service?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes; at least that much.

"A VOICE. And what was the cost?

"Mr. FOLLMER. About 59½ cents a mile.

"A VOICE. That is not enough.

"Mr. FOLLMER. Fifty-nine and a half cents a mile, at a cost of at least $300,000. Of course, that half million miles will have to be made on the streets, and that means added congestion.

"Mr. STEENERSON. The present cost is $476,000. It would cost $176,000 more expense by automobile service. Has anyone else any figures on the comparative cost of the automobile service as a substitute?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I believe the postmaster of New York submitted the figures to the department at Washington in February or March last.

"Mr. STEENERSON. How long were you in the mail service?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I was with the Government service exactly 30 years and 3 days.

"Mr. STEENERSON. And in what various capacities?

"Mr. FOLLMER. In various capacities. I started in as office boy and worked up through the clerical grades to Assistant Superintendent of Mails, where I had charge of the department of schemes of distribution, transportation schedules, and the issuance of orders and instructions governing the operation of the mail service.

"The CHAIRMAN. And you were in charge of the department of schedules until what date?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Until March 12 last.

"The CHAIRMAN. March 12, 1917?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes.

"The CHAIRMAN. Of this year?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes.

"Mr. STEENERSON. You have had 30 years' experience?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Thirty years' experience, and during that time we have used every possible means for the transportation of mails—first, horse wagons; then elevated railroad trains and surface cars; and finally pneumatic-tube service for the letter mails and automobiles for the bulky matter.

"Mr. STEENERSON. What do you know about there being damage to mail in the tubes?

"Mr. FOLLMER. The quantity of mail so damaged is infinitesimal.

"Mr. STEENERSON. It is infinitesimal?

"Mr. FOLLMER. There is not as much damage to the mails in the tubes as there is to the parcel-post mails carried in the automobiles.

"Mr. STEENERSON. As I understand your testimony, it is that there is an advantage in having direct communication by tube from, say, Station J down to Wall Street rather than to have an automobile, because the automobile would have to stop on the way?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Stop all the way along the line, at least 10 stops.

"Mr. STEENERSON. It would be impracticable, in your judgment, to maintain a direct automobile service between these different stations so as to carry direct?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Oh, yes; it would be absolutely impracticable. The number of cars would have to be multiplied by about 10.

"Mr. STEENERSON. If each had direct service?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Practically, what they have now by tube?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes.

"Mr. STEENERSON. As to the argument as to the continuous flow, what do you thing of the proposition that—is it or is it not an advantage in the expedition of the mail to have a flow continuously through the tube rather than every hour or so?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I will explain how that works out. Letters are mailed in the post-office stations by the public or brought in by the letter carriers or collection wagons at all hours of the day. These mails, after the postage stamps are canceled, are taken to primary separation cases and boxed up into States and cities. This work is done at about 50 post-office stations in New York.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Forty-nine.

"Mr. FOLLMER. The mail is boxed up and dispatched by tube continuously to the big distribution centers, where the State mails are distributed for the railroad routes and then sent by tube to Grand Central, Pennsylvania, and Hudson Terminals. Those are the three great centers for outgoing mail, where expert distributors are constantly engaged in distribution, dispatches being made practically every half hour throughout the day and night. If this mail should be received by an infrequent wagon service all at once——

"The CHAIRMAN (interrupting). It would be congestion.

"Mr. FOLLMER. It would mean congestion, and consequently mails which now connect with certain trains would not be ready in time for dispatch.

"Mr. BELL. Take more clerks?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Take more clerks and delay the mails. We have been considering the mails originating in the city. The mails arriving by trains must also be taken into account. Letters for New York City and for New England States arriving on the Pennsylvania Railroad are immediately shot through the tube to the Grand Central or other stations, and the mails received in the Grand Central Depot for the South and West are shot over to the Pennsylvania Terminal. If they were sent by automobile they would be held until the automobiles are loaded.

"The CHAIRMAN. That would involve congestion again.

"Mr. FOLLMER. That would involve congestion and loss of time. As a maatter of fact, mails for the general post office arriving by train at Grand Central Station are received by tube at the general post office long before the first wagon arrives, which enables the distributors at the general post office to commence their work soon after arrival of the trains.

"Mr. STEENERSON. What hours do the tubes run?

"Mr. FOLLMER. From 4 in the morning until 11 at night on week days.

"The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, are there any other questions?

"Mr. BELL. During your incumbency here in the post office, were you called upon at any time to make a statement in reference to the pneumatic-tube service?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; I was not.

"The CHAIRMAN. When this commission investigated it, did they ask your experience about it?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; Mr. Morgan was postmaster, and naturally they sent to the head of the office.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did he not bring in his administrative officers?

"Mr. FOLLMER. He called upon them for reports.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you make a report then?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I prepared data and statistics.

"The CHAIRMAN. I see. You prepared data and statistics for Mr. Morgan, and what you said was included in his report.

"Mr. ROUSE. On the pneumatic service, did you prepare any data?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Data on the proposed substitution of automobiles for pneumatic tubes.

"Mr. ROUSE. In your position as having charge of the schemes?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Yes; as in charge of that department.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Now, you have described the effect of the pneumatic-tube service on the incoming and outgoing mail. Now, have you anything further to say with reference to what might be called the intercity mail—the mail that goes from one part of the city to another—with reference to the tube service?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Why, this—that the post office maintained a letter-carrier service here in New York City. Uptown there is a delivery as late as 8 o'clock at night, and certainly a great deal more mail is taken out on each carrier's delivery because of the use of the pneumatic tube than would be delivered otherwise. There is hardly a section of New York City which has not some business interests; business mail originates everywhere, and letters mailed at Station J (One hundred and twenty-fifth Street), for instance, for the down-town section, where the last delivery is made at 4.30 p. m., can leave as late as a quarter of 4 and be delivered the same night. Those mails could not reach down town any earlier than 7 or 8 o'clock at night if there were no tube service and would consequently be delayed in delivery until the next day. The time in transit between all post-office stations is materially less by tube than wagon; as much as two hours is gained between certain stations and more than one hour between the majority.

"Mr. STEENERSON. So you think the advantage to the expedition of the mail that originates and terminates in the city is just as great, if not greater; greater as to the mails that come in from outside and go outside from inside?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I think it is just as great.

"The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen, are there any other questions by any other member of the committee?

"Mr. BELL. Have you any other information as to how many more automobiles it would take to transfer mail if taken from the tube?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; I do not know how many more it would take. I think there are about 250 wagons in use now, some of those wagons being laid up at certain hours.

"Mr. BELL. Not that many in constant use, are there?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; they are not all in constant use, but they would be in more constant use if the tubes were discontinued. Of course, the automobile contractor would naturally get more service out of the equipment on hand. A great many more runs would be made by the wagons now in use, and a considerable number of additional wagons would be needed.

"Mr. KING. Just one thing I want to emphasize. I want to ask the witness if it were not a fact that with the existence of the tube service you can begin immediately the distribution of the mail as it comes in early in the morning, whereas if you do away with it you have to hold the mail until you load one wagon and start it on the way; so you save by the use of the tube the amount of time consumed in loading the first wagon, and the reference would be true as to the dispatch of the mail after the wagon left the station. If you had other mails sent out on that train you could get it by tube ahead of the wagon; so the substitution of the automobile for the tube would delay the receipt of the mail in the morning and cut down the hour of its departure in the evening.

"Mr. FOLLMER. No question about it.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Have we any statistics as to the amount of money that passes through the mail, the amount of checks passing through the mail here?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; I have no statistics upon that point.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Most of the transactions of the clearing house, or only a small part, goes through the mail?

"Mr. FOLLMER. Practically all checks received from out-of-town customers come in by mail.

"Mr. STEENERSON. You have statistics as to the clearings?

"Mr. FOLLMER. No; I have not.

"Mr. STEENERSON. I meant they are in existence?

"Mr. FOLLMER. I should imagine so. I wish to add further regarding direct wagons to and from the railroad stations. Theoretically it might appear that satisfactory service might be obtained by their use, but practically it would work out in this way: Take the New York Central Depot—I have not a time-table with me just now, but we will say there is a train going out at 4 o'clock on the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, another at 4.08, and one on the New York Central at 4.20, and perhaps another at 4.25 p. m. Now, if the pneumatic service were abolished, the post office would not put on an automobile trip for each of those trains, but would use one wagon trip for all four trains. That wagon would have to reach the railroad station in time for the first train and have mail for all four trains, so that mail for the 4.20 train would have to be closed out 20 minutes earlier to the business man who may have important letters for his mill or correspondents. With the tube service this early closing is not necessary, because the mails are sent by the tube up to the latest time for each individual train. The same applies to incoming trains. The post office would schedule one wagon to convey the mail received on several trains arriving at different times. If direct wagons were scheduled for each individual train, the wagon service in New York City would cost a million dollars a year.

"The CHAIRMAN. The committee would be glad to have you supplement that statement, and will excuse you with its thanks for your attendance and testimony.

"SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT OF MR. GEORGE J. H. FOLLMER, OF THE GUARANTY TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK.

"Since testifying before your committee on September 11 last I have read the report of the committee of the Post Office Department, which I had not seen prior to that time, and after going over the report do not hesitate to state that I do not concur with the conclusions set forth therein.

"The whole case of the Post Office Department appears to be contained in the following recital of advantages and disadvantages printed in the report:

"'The principal advantages of pneumatic tubes for the transportation of mail are:

"'1. A high rate of speed between stations for limited quantities of mail.

"'2. Freedom from surface-traffic congestion.

"'The principal limitations and disadvantages of pneumatic tubes for the transportation of mail are:

"'1. The capacity of each tube container is limited to about 5 pounds of letter mail, and all classes of mail can not be carried.

"'2. The rapidity of dispatch of tube containers is limited to intervals of about 15 seconds, so that only about 20 pounds of letter mail can be dispatched each minute, thus necessitating the paralleling of the entire system of tubes by vehicular service at the time of heavy dispatches.

"'3. Inability of tubes to carry many special-delivery parcels, owing to the limited size of the containers.

"'4. The necessary relaying of containers at way stations involves loss of time and requires that all intermediate stations be kept open, with attendants on duty.

"'5. The inability to dispatch mail to intermediate stations during continuous transmission between any two points.

"'6. Inability to dispatch mail to the point where it is received by or taken from the railroad companies without additional handling.

"'7. Frequent complaints resulting from damage to mail caused by careless locking of containers and by the accidental opening of containers in transit.

"'8. Inability to prevent dampness and oil in the tubes at certain times, resulting in damage to the mails.

"'9. Discontinuance of service on entire line results from stoppage of the operation of the tube at any point on that line.

"'10. Inflexibility of the service, as it can not be expanded to meet recurring or emergent conditions, thus resulting in congestion.

"'11. The terminal equipment of the tubes occupies a considerable amount of desirable space in post-office quarters, for which high rentals are paid by the department.

"'12. The excessive cost of tube service ($17,000 per mile per annum).'

"An analysis of these statements leads to the conclusion that the advantages have been entirely underestimated and that some of the so-called disadvantages are incorrect statements of fact; others can not be considered as disadvantages in the light of experience, and others still are so worded as to lead to fallacious conclusions.

"I will state, briefly, in connection with each statement of the committee, my reasons for this characterization of the report, in so far as the pneumatic-tube service in New York City is concerned.

"No. 1. A high rate of speed between stations for limited quantities of mail.

"The pneumatic tubes provide a high rate of speed for the dispatch of practically all important mail, the prompt delivery of which is essential to the business interests of this city. The mail so forwarded consists of letters, also daily and financial papers, and articles of other classes bearing special-delivery postage stamps. Mail matter of these classes is expedited in delivery between the general post office and the different post-office stations as much as two hours in some cases.

"No. 2. Freedom from surface-traffic congestion.

"Traffic congestion upon the streets of New York City is such that the automobile mail wagons which carry the bulky mails can not perform the speed of 9 to 12 miles per hour, as called for by existing contracts, notwithstanding the fact that the mail wagons are given the right of way by the traffic police so as to enable them to make their trips without interference. If the tube service were curtailed, the letter mails would necessarily also have to be carried on these wagons.

"In its endeavor to provide a speedy service on the streets the Post Office Department, some years ago, substituted auto service for the old horse-drawn wagons at a material increase in cost, but soon after this service went into operation it was found that the contract speed could not be maintained and that the service was but slightly better than the former horse-drawn wagon service. It became necessary to allow additional running time between practically all points, so that the present speed of the automobile is little better than 7 miles per hour, as against 30 miles per hour by tube, and as the traffic congestion upon the streets is rapidly growing worse, it is probable that before long it will not be practicable to make as much as 7 miles per hour. On page 12 of the report of the committee it is stated that the tube speed is about twice that of the automobiles, whereas it is at least three or four times more speedy.

"No. 1. The capacity of each tube container is limited to about 5 pounds of letter mail, and all classes of mail can not be carried.

"The capacity of the individual tube container is 10 pounds, as has been testified to in former hearings and can be easily proven. A great variety of matter is sent by tube, the dispatches not being limited to letter mail. Owing to the many complaints received by the post office of delay in delivery of daily and financial papers, a considerable quantity of such mail, which was formerly forwarded by automobile, is now dispatched through the tube in addition to the letter mail.

"No. 2. The rapidity of dispatch of tube containers is limited to intervals of about 15 seconds, so that only about 20 pounds of letter mail can be dispatched each minute, thus necessitating the paralleling of the entire system of tubes by vehicular service at the time of heavy dispatches.

"The tube containers are actually dispatched at certain hours when the mails are unusually heavy with a frequency of one every 8 or 10 seconds, and, as these carriers contain at least 10 pounds each, it is possible to send as much as 60 pounds each minute. Official reports published by the Post Office Department indicate a shorter interval than 15 seconds between dispatches.

"It is not a fact that the physical limitations of the tube service necessitates the paralleling of the entire system of tubes by vehicular service at the time of heavy dispatches. Four or five of the post-office stations located near the railroad terminals make up a few pouches of letter mail for dispatch by wagon during the evening hours when the mails are exceptionally heavy, so as to keep the tube lines open for the supplementary dispatches from the large terminals. These pouches are dispatched in the wagons which are regularly scheduled to carry the bulky mails and which would run even if no letter mails were forwarded thereby.

"No. 3. Inability of tubes to carry many special-delivery parcels, owing to the limited size of the containers.

"The tubes carry practically all first and second class special-delivery mail. Special-delivery stamps are occasionally affixed by the public to parcel-post packages of large dimensions, and such packages, which constitute only a fraction of the special-delivery mail, are forwarded by wagon.

"No. 4. The necessary relaying of containers at way stations involves loss of time and requires that all intermediate stations be kept open, with attendants on duty.

"The time required for relaying containers at way stations is infinitesimal, only a few seconds being taken for that purpose. All intermediate stations are open during the entire 24 hours of the day for regular post-office business. During the hours that the tubes are in operation mails are constantly received from the public or brought in by letter carriers from the street letter boxes or are received from trains, and as fast as these mails are sorted by the clerks they are dispatched for train connections or delivery; consequently the tube service is in constant use at these points and attendants are kept on duty for this work, as well as for relaying the carriers from other stations.

"No. 5. The inability to dispatch mail to intermediate stations during continuous transmission between any two points.

"The mails can be dispatched to any point at any time. Each intermediate station controls both its own dispatches and the carriers relayed through it. It is therefore enabled to govern the dispatches of all mail passing through.

"No. 6. Inability to dispatch mail to the point where it is received by or taken from the railroad companies without additional handling.

"No extra handling is required for mail which is dispatched by tube to the point where it is delivered to the railroad. Bundles of letters so forwarded are packed into the tube containers at the point where they are made up and when received at the post offices near the railroad terminals, are dumped out of the containers and placed in pouches. The pouches are then delivered to the railroad. If these mails were sent by automobile instead of tube the bundles would have to be thrown into pouches at the point where they are made up, the pouches would have to be locked, checked off on the dispatchers' bill, and then loaded into wagons. Upon arrival at the railroad station they would have to be unloaded, checked again, and then delivered to the railroad, so that the operations are actually fewer when the mails are sent by tube. Mails received from trains are handled in the reverse manner.

"No. 7. Frequent complaints resulting from damage to mail, caused by careless locking of containers and by the accidental opening of containers in transit.

"No system of handling mail has as yet been devised which eliminates entirely damage to mail matter. There is greater liability of damage to mails when forwarded by automobile than when transported by tube. Many complaints result from the loss of articles which could not be delivered because the wrappers became detached by the friction to which the mails are subjected when sent in wagons. If the letter mails were sent by wagons instead of tubes the frequent handling of the additional bags at each station en route would aggravate this condition and undoubtedly result in the receipt of an increased number of complaints.

"No. 8. Inability to prevent dampness and oil in the tubes at certain times, resulting in damage to the mails.

"Damage to the tube mails from dampness and oil is no greater than that which happens to other mails from exposure to the elements when carried between the mail stations and the wagons at the street curb. Owing to conditions at post-office stations, it is frequently necessary to leave the mail bags on the sidewalk while waiting for the wagons to arrive, and in stormy weather, or when the sidewalks are wet, these mails are apt to become damp.

"No. 9. Discontinuance of service on an entire line results from stoppage of the operation of the tube at any point on that line.

"This statement can not be applied to the New York service. When there is a stoppage of the tubes between any two points the mails are sent by way of the cross-town loops and reach the post-office stations affected without little, if any, delay, because of the great speed of the tube service. For instance, if there is a stoppage in the lower west-side line between any points, the general post office can send mail for the stations beyond the point affected by way of the east-side northward route to the Grand Central Station, and from there cross town to the Pennsylvania Terminal, and then southward to the station for which intended.

"No. 10. Inflexibility of the service, as it can not be expanded to meet recurring or emergent conditions, thus resulting in congestion.

"This statement is obscure and indefinite, and the illustration referred to on page 12 of the report of the Post Office Committee in connection therewith does not apply to New York City.

"No. 11. The terminal equipment of the tubes occupies a considerable amount of desirable space in post-office quarters, for which high rentals are paid by the department.

"The cost of space in which to carry on the work of the Post Office Department can hardly be used as an argument against performing its necessary functions. Practically all of the space occupied by the tubes would be needed for bag racks and for storing the additional equipment, such as pouches, locks, etc., which would be used if the tube service were curtailed. It would also be necessary to increase the clerical force, and, consequently, the expense, as there would be a great many additional mail bags to make up and handle daily.

"No. 12. The excessive cost of tube service ($17,000 per mile per annum).

"Owing to the great advantages gained in the expeditious handling of over 5,000,000 letters daily in this city, the cost of the service does not appear to be out of proportion to the benefits which the public derives from the rapid and constant transmission of mails and the great gain in time in delivery and in dispatch from New York of the large volume of important business mail, much of which would lose as much as 12 to 24 hours in delivery if the tube service were curtailed.

"Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, Mr. H. L. Hall, of the National City Bank, is unable to be present, but he would like to have an opportunity to present briefly his thoughts with regard to this matter. We now come to the peculiar physical conditions of New York City, the conditions of congestion which render safe and speedy transportation of mail through the streets of the city very difficult, and in order to cover——

"The CHAIRMAN. Is it a matter of public safety?

"Mr. MEAD. Public safety; and not only public safety, but the limit of time is involved.

"The CHAIRMAN. How much delay would there be?

"Mr. MEAD. In order to cover that point, Inspector Myers, of the police department, in charge of the traffic of this city, is present and will give you information on those phases.

"STATEMENT MADE BY INSPECTOR THOMAS MYERS, OF THE POLICE DEPARTMENT, IN CHARGE OF THE TRAFFIC OF THIS CITY.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you not appear before the Senate committee?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes.

"Mr. STEENERSON. And the House committee?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes. My name is Thomas Myers. I am the inspector in charge of the traffic division of the police department of the city of New York. I have been sent here to represent the police department of the city of New York on the points of street traffic and safety. The department has no interest, as you know——

"The CHAIRMAN (interrupting). In any other phase of the question?

"Inspector MYERS. In any other phase of the question. As you remember, I appeared before your committee in Washington last winter, and before I go further I will say that I have been 26 years a member of the New York police force, 9 years connected with the traffic division, and 3½ years in charge of the traffic squad of the whole city, and I have seen the city grow, and I have seen traffic grow also. As a matter of fact, traffic on the streets of the city of New York is becoming more and more congested, and traffic conditions are now acute. In vehicular accidents there are 700 people killed annually—about 60 a month on the average.

"Mr. STEENERSON. Two a day.

"Inspector MYERS. One person is killed about every 14 hours and one is injured every 23 minutes. In street accidents there are 23,000 persons injured in one year. Trucks, including mail automobiles, cause the greatest number of fatal accidents.

"The CHAIRMAN. By the way, may I ask, do these automobile trucks carrying the mail—are they accorded any special right-of-way privileges?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes; they are accorded special right-of-way privileges about the city.

"The CHAIRMAN. They claim it under some statute, don't they?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes, sir; and in addition to the right of way that we think they are entitled to they assume—at least the drivers assume—a great deal more right of way.

"The CHAIRMAN. They think they are immune from control,

"Inspector MYERS. Yes, sir. Naturally, a police officer on the street has a hesitation about interfering with the United States mail. There is a sign marked 'United States mail' on the front of an automobile, and he naturally hesitates more, possibly, than he should to enforce strictly the laws governing vehicular traffic. The 'United States mail' sign exerts an unconscious influence over a police officer on the street.

"The CHAIRMAN. And the drivers are quick, I suppose, to take advantage of that.

"Inspector MYERS. Yes, sir; quicker than the police officer is to interfere. I have some figures here. Automobile trucks have killed 132 people in a year, and when you consider the small percentage of automobile trucks that there are in the city against the total number of vehicles, you will see at a glance how dangerous it would be to add more trucks to the street.

"Mr. STEENERSON. How many do the mail trucks kill?

"Inspector MYERS. I have not the statistics. I was only notified at 4.30 yesterday of this meeting to-day. I have been away on vacation.

"The CHAIRMAN. If you can get that you will supplement your statement.

"Inspector MYERS. But I do remember—I think five or six a year; about an average of that that the mail trucks kill. That is my recollection now.

"The CHAIRMAN. You can look over your records and give us that.

"Inspector MYERS. I do remember that the very day I appeared before the House committee in Washington last year there was a 10-year-old boy killed by a mail truck over in Brooklyn, and I do know that auto trucks generally cause more fatal accidents than any other type of vehicle. We have in the city about 300,000 vehicles.

"Mr. BELL. Automobiles?

"Inspector MYERS. Automobiles, horse-drawn vehicles, and cars.

"Mr. BELL. Three hundred thousand?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes; 300,000. That is not counting those of neighboring States and cities, which would add nearly 10,000 more, making 310,000 vehicles on the streets of the city of New York; and the majority of these, strange to say, manage to get into the Borough of Manhattan, this borough in which we are to-day, a little territory about 2½ miles wide by 12 miles long. There were 1,660 persons injured and 96 killed by automobile trucks to date this year. There are about 28,000 commercial vehicles, of which about one-half are automobile trucks, so that if 14,000 automobile trucks killed 96 persons during the first eight months of this year, you can imagine what the total will be in the year against the number killed by about 300,000 vehicles. You will see the danger of the truck on account of its size, its weight, the difficulty of controlling same, and, strange to say, they are usually operated by second-rate chauffeurs who are not as well paid, as a rule, as chauffeurs in charge of private automobiles. To me, having watched the traffic grow for the past 26 years and knowing the present traffic congestion in our streets, it is inconceivable to think that any move should be made to place more trucks on our streets. It would be a great thing and a relief to traffic and a saving of lives if the present mail trucks were off the streets. As to doing away with the mail-tube service and arguing about the extension of the service, it seems to me to be the weighing of dollars and cents against the lives and blood of innocent children.

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Inspector, I hate to interrupt you, but I am afraid I will forget. They are putting in a 1-foot tube in London to carry this second and third class mail—newspapers, magazines, and parcels—under the ground. Do you not think that would be the natural development of the mail service all over the world—London, Paris, New York, etc.—all this heavy stuff also?

"Inspector MYERS. It would seem to me to be a very good way to do it. We must get them off the surface of the streets. The streets are already too congested. Something has been said about traffic conditions above Forty-second Street. Traffic is heavy above Forty-second Street, and it seems to be going up town. As a matter of fact, Fifty-ninth Street and Broadway is one of the most congested points in New York City. A tabulation made there shows that in 10 hours 39,800 vehicles and 81,000 pedestrians crossed at that street intersection.

"The CHAIRMAN. That is really the most congested, Fifty-ni..th Street?

"Inspector MYERS. For vehicles, yes; for pedestrians it fluctuates; but it is the greatest congestion from the point of vehicles and pedestrians.

"The CHAIRMAN. How far is that congested district on your streets and in your traffic, particularly with regard to the vehicular question?

"Inspector MYERS. Well, I would say to about One hundred and twenty-fifth Street.

"The CHAIRMAN. About One hundred and twenty-fifth Street?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes, sir; One hundred and twenty-fifth Street. As a matter of fact, we have been increasing our traffic squad faster up town than down.

"The CHAIRMAN. Do you have traffic men there?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes, sir. We have traffic men up in The Bronx, in which borough we are assigning more traffic men every year. Business and traffic are moving uptown. Traffic conditions on the up-town streets are more dangerous on account of the residential sections being up there.

"Traffic men are usually assigned to street intersections in the daytime on account of heavy traffic, and, as occasions arise and traffic increases, they are assigned at night. We have found it necessary to assign more men uptown at night than heretofore. Only recently we assigned a traffic man at Fifty-seventh Street and Fifth Avenue, and we now have a man stationed at night as far uptown as Two hundred and forty-second Street and Broadway.

"The CHAIRMAN. Up to midnight?

"Inspector MYERS. Yes, sir. Now, there is not much more that I can add. Most of you have heard me before.

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes, we have.

"Inspector MYERS. I am on the city streets every day of my life, and I know the danger of the mail truck and know what it means to traffic. One mail truck on the street means about 10 ordinary motor trucks. If you had 200 mail trucks on the streets, it will mean in traffic ten times that number of trucks added to traffic on our already too crowded streets. It is just like adding a drop of water to a glass that is brimming full. It is bound to flow over.

"The CHAIRMAN. We thank you for coming here and giving us this statement.

"(The following is additional to the statement made by Inspector Myers:)

"'The police department has no accurate statistics of persons killed by mail trucks, as the statistics show only the number of persons killed by motor trucks, which, of course, included mail trucks. I do know, however, that several persons have been killed by mail trucks in the past year. The record of fatalities caused by motor trucks shows that, while motor trucks number less than 6 per cent of the total number of autos, yet they caused 40 per cent of the fatalities by motor vehicles in the city, thus showing the great menace to life and limb by this type of vehicle, among which is numbered the mail truck.

"'In order to insure any degree of safety in the operation of motor trucks, the speed of this type of vehicle should be not more than 8 miles per hour in the city.'"

I also insert extract from Mr. Morgan's testimony before the House committee:

"Edward M. Morgan is the greatest living authority on postal affairs. After investigating postal systems and service in all parts of the United States and Europe, I believe that he is the greatest postal expert in the world."—Hon. William R. Willcox, member of the Railroad Commission, ex-postmaster of New York, and late chairman Public Service Commission of New York.

The postal record of Mr. Morgan:

Entered the Postal Service in 1873 as a letter carrier.

Rose by sheer ability rank above rank to postmaster of New York 1907–1917.

At the end of his term the business organizations, press, and public of New York with unprecedented unanimity demanded his retention in office.

Might still be postmaster had he not refused to reverse his stand in the matter of pneumatic-tube mail service, as other postal officials have reversed theirs.

WHAT THE LATE POSTMASTER OF THE METROPOLIS THINKS OF PNEUMATIC MAIL TUBES AND OF THE PROPOSAL TO ABOLISH THEM.

Excerpts from Mr. Morgan's testimony before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session:

"It is my opinion that the continuation of the entire existing system of pneumatic tubes in New York City and Brooklyn is justified because of the rapid service which it provides for the transmission of mail, particularly that of the first class. There are transmitted through such tubes about 80,000 pneumatic tube carriers per day, carrying approximately 5,000,000 pieces of mail. These carriers travel at the rate of 30 miles per hour.

"If the pneumatic-tube service were replaced by wagon service, it would, in my opinion, be far from satisfactory and result in overwhelming complaint from the public and adverse criticism of the service.

"The satisfaction now afforded the public is so great that the increased cost of tube service over that of wagon service is fully justified.

"The advantages of the pneumatic-tube system in New York City are felt throughout the entire Postal Service of the country, by making possible later and more expeditious dispatches of outgoing domestic and foreign mail, as well as the rapid transmission of incoming mails.

"Another important feature of the tube system is the prompt delivery of special-delivery letters.

"About 80 per cent of all first-class mail matter mailed in the city passes through the tubes.

"A more flexible and dependable service for the transportation of letter mail is possible by the utilization of pneumatic tubes.

"The tube service is not affected by storms, street traffic congestion, and other surface conditions. The motor service becomes badly crippled during a sleet or snow storm, and in the event of the discontinuance of the pneumatic tubes there would be no adequate substitute service available. During December, 1915, and January, February, and March, 1916, owing to snowstorms and congested and slippery streets, 209 mail wagons missed connections, with resultant delays to mails.

"Instances where pneumatic-tube service is retarded seldom occur. The tubes are really reasonably proof against interruptions.

"Every additional automobile or truck makes the street congestion greater. I agree with the mayor of New York that it would be a serious menace to life to substitute trucks for tubes.

"I have been in the New York post office since 1873. I am entirely familiar with this tube service and every part of the post-office service. I have no doubt about the desirability of continuing the present system of pneumatic tubes. To discontinue them would be to go backward."

Opinions of the press:

THE TUBES SHOULD BE BOUGHT.

[From the New York World.]

The investments of the tube companies can not be commandeered. They should be bought. If the times are not propitious for appropriations or bond issues for such a purpose, the Government could buy them by adding to the yearly rental an amortization allowance to extinguish the principal in 20 or 25 years. With such a bargain the department could take the tubes at once and make extensions and improvements at its own convenience and cost. The one intolerable course is that the department shall deliberately take a backward step by abandoning a device that all live postal systems use and that is necessary to postal efficiency.

THE PUBLIC'S UNANIMOUS DISAPPROVAL OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL'S PROGRAM.

1918 joint congressional commission to investigate the pneumatic-tube mail service: "The viewpoint of the public, as it appears to the commission, is that letter mail pays for and warrants the highest grade of Postal Service; that there should be no deterioration in the service; that where cities are spending millions of dollars to widen streets and to put traffic above ground and underground, the Government should not add to that traffic by abandoning existing means of underground transportation of mail; that the mail truck is a menace to the life of persons along the streets and tends to obstruct traffic. These are factors in this inquiry which the commission considers are established by the facts."

Merchants' Association of New York: "For all these reasons this association contends that the tube service should be retained without reduction in each of the cities where it now exists, and that it should be extended as rapidly as possible to other important centers of mail traffic."

Boston Chamber of Commerce: "With these facts and data before it, your committee finds it is unanimously and strongly in favor of retaining the pneumatic-tube mail service in Boston."

Chicago Association of Commerce:

"Resolved, That in the judgment of the Chicago Association of Commerce it would be a mistake and a backward step to discontinue or impair the pneumatic-tube postal service, but that, on the contrary, it should be extended and enlarged, as conditions and postal requirements develop."

St. Louis Chamber of Commerce: "The postal committee, after holding several meetings, hearing the Postmaster and others, and personally inspecting the tubes with the postmaster, unanimously recommended that the Government not only retain the tubes, but also substantially extend them."

Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce:

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce urgently requests the members of the Post Office Committee of Congress to recommend an appropriation of sufficient amount not only to continue the present service, but to extend the service as recommended, because the experience of the business men of the city leads them to regard it as of vital importance to the best interests of the public of Philadelphia."

City of New York—Board of Aldermen, December 18, 1917:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Board of Aldermen of the city of New York that the pneumatic mail service now existing in this city is not only indispensable to the prompt and uninterrupted movement of letter mail, but it is also desirable as a means of lessening traffic congestion and danger and that the abolition of that service would be seriously detrimental to the residents of this city, especially to the business interests."

EDITORIAL COMMENT.

New York World, January 15, 1917: "Pneumatic tubes greatly shorten the time necessary for the delivery of letters. If there are not enough of them to handle the increasing mails, there is a strong case for developing the service."

New York World, January 29, 1917: "Is it not about time for Postmaster General Burleson to admit that this particular piece of departmental foolishness and injustice was a mistake, which ought to be corrected with the sanction and cooperation of those responsible for it?"

New York Times, December 15, 1917: "If the post-office freight business is growing so that it needs more trucks, they might be granted, but not at the expense of the fast service which does not incumber the streets nor threaten the safety of pedestrians."

New York Sun, January 9, 1918: "In war time efficient postal service is an absolute necessity and it is hard to agree with Mr. Burleson that a system that is speedy and immune from disturbance of weather conditions is of no value."

New York Times, January 9, 1918: "This city has just been going through a situation in which the mail tubes have been of the utmost value. Snow and arctic temperatures delayed street traffic tremendously. The handling of the city's mail suffered naturally, but not to such an extent as it would have suffered if the tubes had not been there to take care of the urgent first-class mail."

New York World, January 10, 1918: "To close the tubes and put more trucks on streets that can not accommodate their present traffic is to handicap the head house of the Postal Service of the country. As a plain business proposition of national importance the tubes should be kept at work."

New York Journal, January 25, 1918: "The mail is being successfully handled through the tubes, and there is no reason on earth why the modern method should be given up to go back to the old-fashioned and unsatisfactory method. The great cities of New York and Philadelphia and Boston and Chicago surely know what they want and what is best for them in the mail service, and they have said so with earnest and repeated emphasis."

Chicago American, December 9, 1916: "If the tubes are all right for New York, why not for Chicago, Mr. Burleson?"

Chicago Examiner, December 11, 1916: "Chicago business against political theorists in the post office," quotes the following in its editorial:

Samuel Hastings, president of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association: "Chicago, which has the heaviest first-class mail in the country, can not afford to lose the pneumatic-tube service."

John N. O'Leary, president of the Chicago Association of Commerce: "Chicago absolutely needs the pneumatic-tube service and is entitled to it."

W. A. Curtis, of Montgomery Ward & Co.: "The discontinuance of the tubes would be a far step backward."

Chicago Tribune, January 9, 1917: "'False economy'; efficiency, and this includes celerity of service, is the only true economy. It would seem fair that any unnecessary addition to the congestion of our streets and to the dangers of life in them should not be encouraged."

Chicago Examiner, February 21, 1917: "Opposition to the modern pneumatic-tube service has been disarmed by facts and figures. To go back to truck hauling of first-class mail matter in such cities as Chicago and New York would be like resurrecting stagecoaches to take the place of limited express trains."

Chicago Examiner, October 12, 1917: "It seems incredible that a serious attempt was made less than a year ago to commit the Government to an abandonment of the postal tubes in favor of automobile trucks on the street surface. It is important that Congress should be forewarned. Any more attempts to abolish or cripple such postal-tube service as we now have will not be tolerated by public sentiment."

Chicago American, January 28, 1918: "They (the tubes) are very satisfactory. They are fully indorsed by the many millions who use them and pay them and protest against their removal."

"Is it wise or just to sacrifice the great centers where the profits are earned when the sacrifice is not demanded even in the districts where the losses are incurred?"

Chicago Examiner, January 28, 1918: "Cities that have had the advantage of pneumatic-tube service not only protested against a reactionary change to automobile trucks, but favored an extension of pneumatic-tube service under Government ownership as well as control."

Boston American, December 19, 1916: "It is interesting and significant that the business men in all the cities involved have with great emphasis disapproved of the Government's proposed abandonment of the pneumatic-tube service."

Boston Transcript, December 11, 1917: "In the estimation of business men, the tubes have established their worth. They can not be dispensed with now without injury to the service, and it is not just that a fight should have to be made every year to save them from official prejudice."

Christian Science Monitor, February 1, 1918: "What this winter has shown is that the large cities need many more mail tubes instead of less or none."

Boston Post, March 2, 1918: "There is force in the statement that the tubes, being an exclusive postal facility, the systems should be owned and operated by the Government."

Boston Herald, April 3, 1918: "Just now, when time and labor are vital things, to throw into the discard such fast and efficient vehicles as the tubes have proved themselves would be worse than stupid.'

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, January 15, 1917: "The creation of the tube service was a step forward toward an ideal condition of letter transportation. So far as contracts are concerned, if they are not satisfactory they should be revised."

St. Louis Globe-Democrat, January 15, 1917: "An overwhelming sentiment in the business community of every city was in favor of the retention of the underground system of handling letter mail."

St. Louis Globe-Democrat, October 12, 1917: "Ordinary observance and common sense make it clear that auto delivery would often be retarded by congestion in street traffic."

St. Louis Star, October 12, 1917: "It probably would be a greater saving in actual money to go back to the two-horse truck, but St. Louis passed out of the stagecoach era some years ago and it has no desire to revert."

St. Louis Republic, October 13, 1917: "The proposition of substituting three motor trucks for the present tube system, thereby saving the Government a few thousand dollars a year in theory, would in reality cost St. Louis business men untold sums in dollars and inconvenience."

Philadelphia Inquirer, September 20, 1917: "Experience here and elsewhere proves that the pneumatic-tube service is the most expeditious way of handling mails in large cities."

Philadelphia Bulletin, December 31, 1917: "The pneumatic tubes are an indispensable part of the urban postal system."

Philadelphia Inquirer, March 23, 1918: "It is hard to remember any public service which has received a more careful or detailed examination at the hands of Congress. We have had repeated investigations, and the results have always been in favor of the tubes."

Philadelphia Public Ledger, March 23, 1918: "The business community is not especially concerned over the price to be paid for the tubes, for under the terms of the Senate committee's plan that is to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but it is deeply concerned that an unreasoning and unreasonable prejudice shall not be permitted to destroy a facility for the prompt handling of letter mail the value of which has been abundantly and repeatedly proved."

I here insert the affidavit of Mr. Gardner, former member of the expert commission who refused to sign the report. It was sent me by the Merchants' Association of New York:

In the matter of the appropriation for the continuation and extension of the pneumatic-tube mail service.

AFFIDAVIT OF GEORGE A. GARDNER.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of New York, ss:

George A. Gardner, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he resides at No. 611 West One hundred and eightieth Street, New York City, N. Y. That he entered the Postal Service of the United States in 1893, and during the period from November, 1911, to October, 1915, he was assistant superintendent of the Railway Mail Service in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General.

That on July 17, 1915, he was designated by the Postmaster General to serve as a member of the committee "to make careful investigation and report as to the needs and practicability of pneumatic-tube service, as provided by law, in Boston, Mass.; New York, N. Y.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and St. Louis, Mo., preliminary to the consideration by the Postmaster General of the issuance of an advertisement for such service for the term beginning July 1, 1916."

That the said committee entered upon such investigation at New York, N. Y., on August 23, 1915, when it received several requests for public hearings upon the subject of its inquiry, particularly one from the Bronx Board of Trade of the Borough of The Bronx, city of New York, which requested the extension of the pneumatic-tube service to that borough. All requests for public hearings in New York City were, however, denied by the committee, upon the ground that its inquiry was a departmental matter and it was considered unnecessary to hold public hearings. After the committee had been in New York City for several days, without substantial progress in its work, it devoted one day to a personal inspection of the various pneumatic-tube stations in New York City. This inspection consisted in entering the station and glancing at the apparatus and incoming and outgoing mail in a perfunctory manner, the average time occupied being about three to five minutes and no inquiry being made or data being then taken as to quantities of mail received and dispatched, time consumed in transit, dependability and security of operation, or other matters affecting the efficiency or inefficiency of the tube service.

During the course of the committee's inspections it became plain to deponent that the majority of the committee, consisting of W. S. Ryan, superintendent of city delivery, Post Office Department, and John C. Koons, chief post-office inspector, and his assistant, I. T. Mullen, post-office inspector, was hostile to the pneumatic-tube service and favored the substitution of automobile service therefor. This attitude of the majority of the committee was the subject of a conference between deponent and the chairman of the committee, Joe P. Johnston, general superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, who told deponent that he had spoken of the matter to Mr. Mullen and had declared to him that if there was any more of the talk of substituting automobile service for the tube service the committee would find itself in a state of division.

The investigations made of the pneumatic-tube service in Brooklyn, N. Y.; Boston, Mass.; and Chicago, Ill., repeated the perfunctory inspections made in New York City, and in each of said cities public hearings were denied, inspections were made during the hours when the mails were lightest, and no genuine effort was made to get at the facts as to the real value of the pneumatic-tube service. Deponent repeatedly protested to the chairman and to other members of the committee against the slipshod manner in which the investigation was proceeding, but it was manifest to him as it must have been to the chairman that the inquiry was perfunctory and was intended to be perfunctory, the majority of the committee being plainly determined from the outset of the inquiry to discredit the tube service and substitute therefor a Government-controlled automobile service.

When the committee reached St. Louis, Mo., in September, 1915, it had an informal conference with the postmaster of that city, during the course of which a large delegation of business men of St. Louis and East St. Louis (Ill.) appeared and demanded to be heard in favor of continuing the service in St. Louis and extending it in St. Louis and to East St. Louis. A perfunctory hearing was accorded them by the committee, but no stenographic report or other record was made of the arguments advanced thereat. The inspection of the pneumatic-tube service in St. Louis was quite as superficial as that made of it in the cities previously visited by the committee.

The committee concluded its investigation at Philadelphia, Pa., in September, 1915, in an atmosphere that was distinctly hostile to the pneumatic-tube service, for at that time a conference was in progress between the Second Assistant and the Fourth Assistant Postmasters General with the postmaster at Philadelphia, the object of which was not only to eliminate from the postal service in that city the tube service but the trolley-line service, the privately owned motor-car mail service, and the screened-wagon service to and from the railroad stations as well, and to substitute therefor a Government owned and operated automobile service. By direction of the Second Assistant Postmaster General deponent secured and furnished him for use in such conference data concerning the operation of the screened-wagon service. The inspection of the tube service in Philadelphia was conducted in the same perfunctory manner as in the other cities visited by the committee.

At the conclusion of its investigation the members of the committee returned to Washington. Deponent was amazed and disgusted at the manner in which the investigation had been conducted, and conferred upon the subject with Mr. Joseph Stewart, then special assistant to the Attorney General, who, during his previous service as Second Assistant Postmaster General, had recommended the designation of deponent as a member of said committee. At this conference deponent told Mr. Stewart that he (deponent) felt that it was his duty to present a dissenting report disclosing the prejudgment of the subject of its report by the majority of the committee and the perfunctory and unfair manner in which it had conducted its investigation. Deponent received no satisfactory advice from Mr. Stewart, and, being entirely disgusted with the situation, he resigned his position on October 7, 1915, to take other employment.

The phase of the investigation of the committee that was particularly embarrassing and harassing to deponent was that at Chicago and St. Louis the automobiles used by the committee in its official inspections were furnished gratis, over deponent's protest, by a company which had previously sold the automobiles to the Government that were used in the mail service in Washington, at a price higher than the bids of some 19 competing bidders.

GEORGE A. GARDNER.

Sworn to before me this 20th day of May, 1918.
[SEAL.]
H. P. WENIG,
Notary Public, New York County.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much time did the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] use?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota used 55 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had an hour and a half. Thirty-five minutes remain.

Mr. STEENERSON. It seems there is some mistake about that, Mr. Speaker. I had 45 minutes and only yielded for a couple of questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the gentleman started to speak at 12.55.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And there is 45 minutes remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] a few moments ago was speaking about the damage to the mails by the pneumatic tubes being infinitesimal. This box of mail, exhibited on the table before you, was taken out of a tube in Chicago one day last month, and this small package of envelopes—destroyed and soiled envelopes—was taken out of tubes in Chicago during last month, and it only represents a very small part.

Mr. AYRES. I suggest that the gentleman hold it up.

Mr. ROUSE. It can be seen here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was the evidence that the gentleman now lays before the House placed before the congressional commission that had this matter in charge and before it made its report favoring the purchase of the tubes?

Mr. ROUSE. This box of destroyed stuff was not placed before the commission, because the commission had finished its work before this exhibit was produced.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It looks very much like a piece of "after discovered evidence." I call that to the attention of the committee.

Mr. ROUSE. I will state that we had before the commission a large sack of destroyed and damaged mail accumulated from the different tube cities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it due to an accident, or was it an accumulation of matter?

Mr. ROUSE. It was due to insufficient service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Sometimes an accident will destroy a mail motor car. Sometimes one accident will upset a whole railroad mail train, destroying hundreds of thousands of letters at one fell swoop.

Mr. ROUSE. I will insert in the RECORD a summary of the failure of tubes in Chicago for the month of May, which shows that there were over 1,200 pouches of mail delayed and some destroyed during that month, and during April more than 1,900 pouches were delayed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman put in with that the commendations of various trade bodies in Chicago speaking well of the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. ROUSE. I will say to the gentleman that those resolutions are embodied in the hearings.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a fact that they have approved the service, is it not?

Mr. ROUSE. Some of them have. If you will look at the list of stockholders, you will see the reason for their commendation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know that the commercial bodies say that the tubes facilitate the movement of the mail.

Mr. ROUSE. If the gentleman will consult the hearings he will see the list of stockholders. Those lists were taken from the records of the company.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman led a gallant minority of one, with five against him. The gentleman made a good fight, but I think it is fair that the House should know that there were five votes to one on the commission.

Mr. ROUSE. I suppose the House knows that without information from the gentleman, and I am proud of my stand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But this is a good place to put it in?

Mr. ROUSE. It is. It will stay in and will not be stricken out.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. All the postmasters in the United States who know about this service are against it, are they not?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes. All the postmasters in the United States who know about this service are against it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do you recall Mr. Morgan, the postmaster of New York, who went from the post of letter carrier to that of postmaster?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Was he opposed to this?

Mr. ROUSE. I do not think he appeared before our commission.

Mr. DONOVAN. Did he not appear before the committee in New York?

Mr. ROUSE. I do not know as to that. He did not appear before the commission.

Mr. GALLAGHER and Mr. STEENERSON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. ROUSE. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the pneumatic-tube service commission I desire to submit some observations on the subject and to state that while I happen to be the only member of the committee that does not agree with the majority in the conclusion, I feel that I have made a proper decision; and if my conscience is clear in forming that decision, I can have no regrets.

Authorization for the appointment of a commission to investigate the pneumatic-tube mail service in the cities of Chicago, New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, and St. Louis was approved on March 3, 1918, and the following were appointed and constituted this commission: Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK, and Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS, from the Senate; Hon. THOMAS M. BELL, Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON, and myself, from the House.

This commission was directed to investigate the value of the pneumatic-tube service, with a view to the purchase and operation of the same or any portion of it by the Government, and to ascertain the cost and terms upon which such purchase may be made.

The majority of the members of the commission visited the different cities and saw the working of the tube service. This service, as you well know, is for the transmission of the first-class mail. The records show that some mail other than first class is occasionally sent through the tube, but this is very seldom. The records also show that the tube handles about 5 per cent of the entire mail in the five cities in which the service is operated; that it handles less than 50 per cent of the first-class mail in Chicago and a somewhat greater per cent in the other cities.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition before the House is the purchase of this entire pneumatic-tube service of about 56½ miles from the companies now operating the service for an amount which is fixed by the majority members of the commission at not more than $4,432,622.

The cities now having pneumatic-tube mail service and the number of miles of tube in each city is as follows: In New York, 26.4290; in Brooklyn, 1.3500; in Chicago, 10.0447; in Philadelphia, 9.0999; in Boston, 6.7740; and in St. Louis, 1.9880.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I would like to ask my colleague the same question as I asked the gentleman [Mr. STEENERSON] preceding him, whether the commission attempted to ascertain the original cost of these plants in the various cities?

Mr. ROUSE. I will say to the gentleman that this commission did not.

Mr. AYRES. Have you any evidence to show what the original cost was?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes. I have the report of the former commission, which is included in the hearings, the 1912 commission, and that report was made by the American Audit Co., and for the information of the gentleman and the House I will read a part of it. I will read first that part relating to the Philadelphia concern, particularly with reference to the cost of construction. I read:

COST OF CONSTRUCTION.

The books of the company show the following charges to construction account:

Bourse Station (common stock)	$300,000.00
Broad Street Station (bonds)	200,000.00
Stations S and O (preferred stock)	160,000.00
Stations J and C (preferred stock)	200,000.00
Stations S and D (preferred stock)	235,000.00
Reading Terminal Station (preferred stock)	20,000.00
Fairhill and North Philadelphia (preferred stock)	199,750.00
S and O alterations (cash)	4,880.35
Making a total of	1,319,630.35

No information is contained on the books of the company as to the cost of the Bourse Station line, other than $300,000 par value of common stock was issued to the late William J. Kelly for the construction of this line.

We are informed by Mr. Milholland that the best information obtainable is that the actual cost to Mr. Kelly of the construction of this line was $42,000, and it so appears in the testimony given before your commission by W. P. J. Murray, the treasurer of the Pneumatic Transit Co.

Mr. AYRES. That is what line?

Mr. ROUSE. That is the Bourse Station line. I read further:

The cost to the company of the Broad Street line was, as stated above, $200,000 in bonds of the company. No other information is obtainable from their books. We were informed by Mr. Milholland that the proceeds of these bonds were used to pay debts of the corporation as well as the cost of actual construction. No information is obtainable at this time as to the actual cost of construction. It appears, however, from the tabulated statements discussed by Mr. Murray before your commission, and appended to his testimony, that the cost of construction amounted to approximately $60,000.

For the benefit of the gentleman and the House I will insert in my remarks the remainder of that report. That is just an example of the cost of the different lines.

Lines S and O, J and C, S and D, and Reading Terminal were built under contracts with the Batcheller Pneumatic Tube Co., for which they received $615,000 par value of preferred stock of the Pneumatic Transit Co., as above noted. An examination of the books of the former company shows that no attempt was made to keep the cost of the construction of these four lines separate. Their books, however, show that a profit of $176,590.88 was made on this construction.

During the period of the construction the accounts of the Batcheiler Co. were under the charge of M. B. Riffo, who, we are informed, was a defaulter for upward of $40,000 from the company, and on or about June 4, 1908, was arrested on a charge of forgery and embezzlement. Many of the records, so we have been informed, were destroyed and falsified by this man Riffo. Public accountants were called in by the company and the books were straightened up to the best of their ability and new balances brought down. It is claimed by the company, and it so appears to us, that the records are very incomplete and unreliable, owing to the manipulation just mentioned. It is further claimed by Mr. Milholland that large sums of money which should have been charged to these contracts were omitted. We can only present this matter to you as we found it for your consideration.

The line from Fairhill to North Philadelphia was constructed for the company at a cost of $199,750 par value of their preferred stock. We submit herewith Exhibit C, cost of construction of the tube system, starting from Station O, to Fairhill, to North Philadelphia Station, which shows the actual cost to have been $96,793.71. It is claimed by the company that this line was built by their own engineers; that, in addition to the physical conditions being extremely favorable, they were also able to take advantage of an unusual condition in the market and purchase their material at a much less figure than they have been able to do before or since. They therefore claim this particular piece of construction is not a fair one to use as a comparison. The total cost per mile figures $53,833, as against their engineer's estimate for lines J and C of $81,350 per mile.

In the engineer's estimate, which we are submitting herewith as Exhibit D, it will be noted that there are charges for "station equipment" for Broad Street station and stations J and C amounting to about $60,000, as against a charge of approximately $23,000 for "station equipment" as shown in Exhibit C (Fairhill and North Philadelphia station). Our conclusions are that only an appraisal of the physical property will give you any authentic information as to the actual cost of this construction.

From the above it will be noted that the charge to construction account on the company's books is approximately $1,123,000, while the actual direct cost was approximately as follows:

Bourse station	$42,000
Broad Street station	60,000
Stations S and O, J and C, S and D, Reading Terminal station	439,000
Fairhill and North Philadelphia	97,000
S and O alterations	5,000
Making a total of	643,000

Mr. KING. For the sake of information, will the gentleman state the cost of the pneumatic-tube system in the city of Chicago?

Mr. ROUSE. I will, if it is included in that report of the audit company.

Mr. KING. Was there evidence before the commission that it cost $1,000,000?

Mr. ROUSE. No; there was no evidence before the commission of which I had the honor of being a member in regard to the value of these tubes or the cost of them. I am taking that report from the 1912 commission.

Mr. KING. Is it not in the record that Mr. Montgomery, of the Chicago Association of Commerce, stated that it cost $1,000,000?

Mr. ROUSE. It may be in the hearings. I have no information of that.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Can the gentleman give us any estimate of the original cost of the 56 miles of tube that the Government is now supposed to buy?

Mr. ROUSE. I think I can, by going through the report of the audit company.

Mr. POU. Will not all these questions be answered in the course of the gentleman's remarks, if the gentlemen who are interrogating him will be patient?

Mr. ROUSE. Not all of them. I would be glad to yield, but I can not yield further, because I have not sufficient time.

I do not believe any good business man would contract for any piece of property until after he knew that the title to the property was clear. I do not believe that any good business man would want to buy a public utility until after he was assured that the franchises were secure. This commission did not investigate the franchise which the tube companies may have in any of the cities. However, a former commission was appointed in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 24, 1912, employed Mr. Nathan B. Williams, an attorney of Washington, to look into and report on their duration, and his report is in part as follows:

In Boston the tube company has a right to occupy all streets, and the franchise is revocable on order of city council.

In New York the tube company has a franchise for 25 years from 1897. This franchise will expire in 1922, or four years hence.

In Chicago the tube company has a franchise for 20 years from October 12, 1903, with right of purchase after October 12, 1913. This franchise expires in 1923, and under its provisions the property reverts to the city of Chicago.

In St. Louis the tube company has a franchise for 25 years, presumably from June 10, 1903. This franchise will, therefore, expire in June, 1928.

In Philadelphia, no terms.

In connection with the Philadelphia franchise, however, attention is called to section 12 of an ordinance regulating the laying and construction of underground wires, electrical conductors, conduits, cables, or tubes, approved the 5th day of August, 1886, which was submitted by Mr. Williams and which reads as follows:

Should any company, corporation, firm, or individual to which privileges have heretofore or shall hereafter be granted for the laying of underground wires, electrical conductors, conduits, cables, or tubes, dispose of any of the franchises granted by ordnance, or lease to, consolidate, or merge with any other company, corporation, firm, or individual, they shall forfeit all rights and privileges granted to them by the city of Philadelphia, and upon satisfactory proof being furnished to the chief of the electrical department and the city solicitor, they are hereby authorized and directed to take action against the offending company, corporation, firm, or individual, as provided for in section 9 of this ordinance.

With respect to keeping the streets in repair, the franchises for the different cities require, according to the report of Mr. Williams:

In Boston: Person opening surface of street must make repairs for 12 months.

In New York: The streets must be restored and maintained.

In Chicago: A deposit covering estimates for repairs costs must be maintained.

In Philadelphia: Repairs must be maintained for three years.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman care to yield at this point?

Mr. ROUSE. I will yield once more, but I do not care to yield any further.

Mr. KING. Just at that point I would like to ask the gentleman if the city government of Chicago has not made some arrangement or agreement with the pneumatic-tube company with reference to an extension of the franchise?

Mr. ROUSE. It has not; and, further, it refused to at a recent meeting, and the property will revert to the city of Chicago at the expiration of the present franchise.

For the Government to spend millions of dollars to purchase tube systems operating under franchises which will expire within such a short period of time would be indefensible. In one instance in Chicago the property will revert to the city upon the expiration of the franchise and in another in Philadelphia all rights and privileges granted by the city will be forfeited upon sale. No business man would think of spending a dollar of his own money under like conditions and surely we would not vote to squander the money of the public under circumstances where we would not be willing to spend our own.

My views as to the value of the pneumatic tubes to the Postal Service and the advisability of their purchase by the Government are in harmony with the opinions expressed by Members of Congress, congressional and departmental committees, departmental and postal officials thoroughly familiar with the service, and others eminently qualified to pass on this subject. Were this not true, I would hesitate to differ from the other members of this commission.

In order to show some of the early history of the pneumatic tube, Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert in my remarks a part of a speech delivered on this floor on the 25th of April, 1900, by the late Supreme Court Justice, William M. Moody, of Massachusetts, who was a Member of Congress and who evidently knew some of the early history of the pneumatic tube:

Now, Mr. Chairman, I crave the attention of the House while I undertake to show how this ill-begotten appropriation began. I think it will be a warning to us to proceed with caution. Let me have your attention for but a few moments upon this proposition.

I was stating that the first appropriaion was made when Mr. Neilson was Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under whose administration?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusets. I do not want to bring any politics into it at all. Within six weeks, at the outside, after he had left the office, he was given $1,000 in cash and $10,000 in stock for his services at Washington during the succeeding year. What they were I do not know. What they could properly be I could not guess; but he was given this stock.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman, there was other testimony before the commission. I shall mention no names, and I regret extremely to have to speak upon this subject, but we found that the pneumatic-tube system in New York was constructed by contractors who took their pay in stock and bonds; that the only value which that stock and those bonds had was the contract with the Government. It was certainly unfortunate—I think nothing else, believe nothing else, but unfortunate—it was certainly unfortunate that a holder of the bonds and one of the contractors was a Member of this House and a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

A MEMBER. Give us his name.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I decline to state.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the report develop that fact?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman state his name?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusets. I will not. As showing the methods employed by the New York company I will state that a large block of the stock of this company as a New Year's present was sent to a near relative of an important and influential Member of the House. I am glad to say that the return mail was not allowed to depart from Washington without carrying back that dishonorable and dishonoring gift. [Applause.]

Our beloved chairman, Hon. JOHN A. MOON, who has been a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for many years and who is well versed in all postal matters, stated in a speech on the floor of this House, on the 15th day of January, 1917, that "the service was born in iniquity and has been maintained by corruption and graft."

Hon. FRED L. BLACKMON, who was a member of a former commission and who served many years with distinction as a Member of Congress, and who is at present a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, and whose judgment in affairs relating to the Postal Service receives the most careful consideration, differed with Senator SMITH and Mr. Stewart, two members of the same commission, in their views and stated:

First. I do not believe that the Government can operate a pneumatic-tube system as cheaply as can private individuals.

Second. I am not convinced that there exists a necessity for the operation of the fifty-odd miles of 8 inch pneumatic tubes.

Third. If the necessity exists for the use of pneumatic tubes, the present tubes have not the capacity to keep pace with the increase in mail matter that is bound to come from a perfection of our Parcel Post System.

Fourth. A careful examination of all the testimony and facts submitted leads me to believe that the Government can take care of this class of mail by contract, using screen wagons and automobiles, more cheaply than it can be handled by any system of pneumatic tubes.

I am not prepared to say that the $17,000 per mile paid for the service now being handled by the use of the pneumatic-tube system is excessive, but I am convinced that there is not sufficient mail handled through these tubes to warrant the Government in paying $17,000 per mile for the service.

In view of the foregoing conclusions reached by me, I can not join in recommending to Congress a purchase of these tubes.

Former Representative Victor L. Murdock was also a member of the 1914 commission, and those who served with him in Congress well know that he was a close student of postal matters. He also differed with Senator SMITH and Mr. Stewart and submitted a minority report, in which he states:

I do not believe that a purchase of these tubes by the Government would be warranted by the facts. I am not only opposed to such purchase but I also believe that certain parts of the present tube service should be discontinued.

Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Chicago, a distinguished Member of this Congress, who is zealous in guarding the interest and efficiency of the Postal Service and whose judgment in matters of postal affairs is eagerly sought, stated before the Post Office Committee in December, 1913:

Would you be surprised to know that an investigation that I made of the pneumatic-tube system in Chicago led me to the conclusion that it was a service of no special value, except in the matter of the 12 minutes time saved in closing the mail; that they would have to close 12 minutes earlier if they did not use the service; but that all mail sent through the pneumatic tubes from the office to the railway stations had to be broken up and be put in small packages in order to put it through the tubes at all, and then it had to be redistributed for transportation over railroad at a cost of $60,000? A number of clerks sufficient to consume $60,000 a year in pay had to be maintained to put that mail into form. Perhaps it might surprise you to be told that I could take a wheelbarrow from the main post office and start up to any of the ordinary stations with it, and load it in, and get it, taking the time for redistribution into consideration.

Mr. F. H. Galbraith, superintendent of mails of the Chicago post office, one of the most efficient postal officials in the United States and who has served faithfully for more than 30 years, in part of a report which he submitted to the Post Office Department under date of September 8, 1917, states in part that under no circumstances should the Government purchase the inefficient, antiquated, and worn-out pneumatic-tube equipment.

I desire to insert in my remarks a summarized report showing the time of suspension of pneumatic-tube service in Chicago for the month of May, 1918, during which time more than 1,200 pouches of first-class mail were delayed on account of the accidents and inefficiency of the tube service. I am informed by the Post Office Department that during the month of April, 1918, more than 1,900 pouches of mail were delayed on account of this inefficient service.

The postmaster of Philadelphia, in a report dated January 5, 1918, clearly analyzes the effects of the pneumatic tubes on, as well as their worth to, the Postal Service. He states that—

While it is my desire that the most ample and efficient means be provided for the transportation of mails in this city, I can not recommend the continuance of the pneumatic-tube system, which contributes but little, if any, expedition in the handling of mails when a saving of $130,819.66 per annum can be effected by the use of Government-owned automobiles.

The postmaster of Boston, Mass., Hon. William F. Murray, a former member of the House, states:

* * * With the automobile reaching the state of efficiency that it has, and the tendency of mailers to send large parcels of mail matter at the first-class rate and by special delivery, the pneumatic-tube system has become an extravagance, and it is my belief that the motor-vehicle service provides a more satisfactory system for transportation of mail than the pneumatic tubes. * * *

The postmaster at Philadelphia, the postmaster at Boston, and the postmasters at Chicago, St. Louis, and New York have all recommended against the purchase or extension of these tubes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. ROUSE. I will, but this will be the last time I will yield.

Mr. DONOVAN. Is it not a fact that in April, 1902, a commission reported on this subject, and that in consequence of that report a four-years' contract was made?

Mr. ROUSE. There was no appropriation in 1902 for pneumatic tubes. Now, I decline to yield further.

In a report submitted under date of March 31, 1917, of an exhaustive investigation of the pneumatic-tube service by eight post-office inspectors in New York City and Brooklyn, the following conclusions were reached relative to the purchase of the tubes:

In our efforts to offer the best solution of the transportation problem, we are forced to the conclusion that the penumatic-tube service should be abandoned entirely and that a complete and efficient motor-driven vehicular service should be inaugurated.

In a report submitted by the postmaster of Chicago under date of September 8, 1917, on the pneumatic-tube service, the following conclusions are reached:

The concensus of opinion of the supervisory employees of the Chicago office who have had many years of practical experience in matters pertaining to the distribution and dispatch of mails is that it would be inadvisable from every point of view for the Government to renew the contract with the Chicago Postal Pneumatic Tube Co., or to purchase its equipment.

The pneumatic-tube service, although always exceedingly extravagant, served some useful purposes in times past when it came into competition with horse-drawn vehicles, but conditions have changed with the advent of the motor truck.

Under this new competition the tubes should be abandoned, as they have outlived their usefulness, and it is safe to say that under like circumstances no corporation or large business concern would hesitate in deciding the matter strictly on its merits as a business proposition.

The pneumatic tube is doubtless an efficient instrument for some purposes, but it is not a sufficient instrument for postal purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROUSE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] controls the time.

Mr. ROUSE. I am asking the unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the time was fixed by the House.

Mr. ROUSE. But I can ask unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TAGUE. Reserving the right to object, but not wanting to do so, I should like to ask if the same amount of time will be given on the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to suggest that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] is the only member of the commission who has dissented from the majority report. He has filed a minority report, and I think an exception ought to be made in his case.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] can yield time if he wishes to do so. A great many Members have left, obviously expecting to come back at half past three, and I do not think we ought to extend the time.

Mr. MOON. I have promised all my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] objects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be extended 10 minutes, of which 5 minutes shall be given to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE].

Mr. FOSTER. That is just the same thing that has been objected to.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think we ought to extend the time.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has just objected to that.

Mr. ROUSE. I withdraw my request, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROUSE. In discussing the limited capacity of the tubes, the postmaster of New York City, Hon. Thomas G. Patten, another former Member of the House, states:

That while the tubes are available at all times during contract hours, they do not seem to be adaptable to the complete handling of large quantities of mail, because of limited capacity, and when used extensively at any one point prevent their use at intermediate points; while, on the other hand, the automobile is adaptable for carrying all classes of mail. The responsibility for the delay in transit can be more readily located by screen-wagon service than by tube service.

At this point I insert a letter from Mr. Joel C. Close, postmaster of Cincinnati, Ohio:

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE,
Cincinnati, Ohio, March 23, 1918.

Hon. A. B. ROUSE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I read last night with a great deal of interest your minority report on the pneumatic-tube proposition. I agree with your report in its entirety, and can not conceive of anyone reaching a different conclusion unless he is personally interested in the tube companies. The matter of installing tubes in this city was brought to my attention about a year ago when appointed a member of the committee to consider the proposition. Mr. Murray, representing the American Pneumatic Tube Co. was here and spent considerable time going over the matter with me. Without any specific knowledge as to what kind of service the tubes were giving in other cities, I was nevertheless able to show Mr. Murray and others it could not be put into practical operation here. It was suggested that large tubes about 6 feet in diameter be constructed with a view of handling all the mail through these tubes. I could not see where this would advance the handling of the mails over the automobile. It was estimated that a tube of this kind would cost $45,000 per mile per annum. This seemed to be prohibitive.

I could cite as an instance of the speed made by automobiles the case of mail arriving on Chicago and Cincinnati train No. 34 at 7 a. m. I arranged with the screen-auto people, the depot people, and the Railway Mail Service clerks to have all the first-class mail from this train taken from the Railway Mail Service car first, then hustled around to the auto truck on a depot truck and brought immediately to the post office without waiting for second, third, or fourth class mail. By this arrangement we could and did get all of that first-class mail to this office in 10 minutes after the arrival of the train at the Central Union Depot. Owing to the great quantity of this mail I do not believe it could be sent up to this post office from the Central Union Station through pneumatic tubes in less than one-half hour, and at times it would no doubt take much longer.

I wish to commend you for your courageous stand in this matter, and you certainly deserve to win out.

Yours, very sincerely, JOEL C. CLOSE.

That Congress itself seriously questioned the value of the pneumatic tube to the Postal Service is clearly demonstrated by the act of April 21, 1902. The limitations and restrictions placed upon the Postmaster General by this act deprive him of all authority in administering the pneumatic-tube service. This act provides:

First. That no advertisement shall issue until after a careful investigation shall have been made as to the needs and practicability of such service and until a favorable report, in writing, shall have been submitted to the Postmaster General by a commission of not less than three expert postal officials to be named by him.

Second. That no contract shall be entered into in any city for the character of mail service herein provided which will create an aggregate annual rate of expenditure, including necessary power and labor to operate the tubes and all other expenses of such, in excess of 4 per cent of the gross postal revenues of said city for the last preceding fiscal year.

Third. That no contract shall be made in any city providing for 3 miles or more of double lines of tube which shall involve an expenditure in excess of $17,000 per mile per annum; and said compensation shall cover power, labor, and all operating expenses.

Fourth. That the Postmaster General shall not, prior to June 30, 1904, enter into contracts under the provisions of this act involving an annual expenditure in the aggregate in excess of $800,000; and thereafter only such contracts shall be made as may from time to time be provided for in the annual appropriation act for the Postal Service; and all provisions of law contrary to those herein contained are repealed.

This act has never been repealed and is in full force and effect to-day. Under its provisions the majority members of this commission were, in my judgment, not justified in recommending to Congress the purchase and retention of the pneumatic tubes. This conclusion is based on the fact that the expert postal officials of the department and in the cities where the pneumatic tubes are operated are unanimous in their condemnation of the tubes and their recommendation that they be discontinued.

The commission appointed according to the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 27, 1908, to investigate and report to Congress the advisability of the Government purchasing the tube system then in use and to be operated by the Government was composed of the postmasters from the following-named cities, Chicago, Brooklyn, New York, Boston, and St. Louis; Joseph Stewart, then Second Assistant Postmaster General, and the superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, were unanimous in their conclusions and recommendations as to the purchase of the tubes, and said, in part, as follows:

The present contracts under which the tube companies are performing mail service will not expire until June 30, 1916, almost eight years hence. During that period there should be ample opportunity for the companies to perfect the systems and for the Post Office Department to observe the effect upon the Postal Service. Further, during that period it is possible that other methods of transportation will be developed or improved so as to change entirely the outlook as it now appears. Five or six years hence, we believe, it will be advisable to renew the consideration of the question of Government ownership.

In view of the foregoing, we consider it appropriate to advise you that, in our opinion, it is not feasible and desirable at the present time for the Government to purchase, to install, or to operate the pneumatic tubes, and this is our unanimous judgment.

At the time of this investigation the autotruck had not become a factor in vehicular transportation, the parcel post had not been established, and mail had not reached the immense volume of to-day. The department then had a contract for the rental of the pneumatic tubes which would not expire for eight years, and if ever the purchase of the tubes could be justified it would have been at that time.

In transmitting this report to Congress, December 15, 1908, the Postmaster General, Hon. George von L. Meyer, approved the conclusions of the commission.

It is the conclusion of the engineers employed by the commission that the pneumatic tube renders the greatest benefit locally, and by this is meant the delivery in the city where the letter is posted. The records of the Post Office Department show that 90 per cent of the mail is deposited after 2 p. m., and in the city of New York 75 per cent after 5 p. m. The schedules of collection and delivery in cities are such that letters mailed after 2 p. m. are not delivered until the following morning; this is also true of mail which arrives after 2.30 p. m. The tubes can not possibly expedite the delivery of this mail, and for that reason the advantages claimed for the tube in handling local mail does not exist.

Should the tubes be abandoned in the cities now being partially served, it would require, in the judgment of the postmasters, an additional number of automobiles to handle the mail now carried by the tubes—in New York 15 to 20, in Chicago 20, in Philadelphia 23, in Boston 8, and in St. Louis 4. The officials of the Post Office Department have repeatedly stated that the present regular vehicle service can handle at least 87 per cent of the mail now transported by the tubes, and with the additional number new schedules will be arranged and later dispatches can be made than are now made by the tubes.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to analyze the plan of payments of the tubes should this bill become a law.

The annual appropriation for the present operation of the tubes is $976,000, and this amount is carried in the bill.

The engineers employed by this commission state that the cost of operating the tubes per annum is $453,434.

The bill as reported to the Senate and returned to the House carries an appropriation of $976,000, for which $500,000 shall be available for operation by the Post Office Department; that is, the difference between the operating expenses and the amount of the appropriation be applied to the payment of the tubes, and estimates that a final payment will be made within 10 or 12 years.

I desire to submit some figures on this subject which I know the Members of this House will, after consideration, say are correct. Grant that the annual cost of operating the tubes is as stated by the engineers to be $453,434.

The commission recommends the payment to the tube companies of 4 per cent per annum on unpaid balances. The first year the interest will be $177,304.

The vice president of one of the tube companies and the engineers say that 5 per cent per annum should be charged for depreciation. This will amount to $221,631.

Extra clerks will be necessary to operate the tubes, and the Post Office Department officials estimate this extra cost to be $150,000 per annum.

The tube companies occupy valuable space in the terminals and substations which the Post Office Department estimates at $32,000 per annum.

The tube companies work two shifts of men a day of 10 hours each. If the Government should buy the tubes, they could only work the men eight hours per day, and would be required to have three shifts. This extra help will amount, in the estimation of the Post Office Department officials, to be $25,000 per annum.

These six items make a total annual expenditure of $1,059,369.

In the place of having $476,000 the first year to pay on the purchase price of the tubes, Congress will be called upon for a deficit of $83,369 for operation alone.

Should the tubes be abandoned, it will cost, estimated by the engineers, Stone and Webster, the sum of $339,012.

To handle the mail by automobiles, and this will effect a saving to the Government of $720,357 over Government-owned pneumatic tubes.

It is my judgment that during the past number of years a propaganda has been conducted to effect the sale of the pneumatic tubes to the Government. Three commissions have been provided for by law during that time to investigate the advisability of purchasing the tubes. Financiers and business men, who are most violently opposed to the Government ownership of the telephone, the telegraph, the railroads, and other public utilities, for some unknown reasons strongly advocate the purchase of the pneumatic tubes. The anxiety on the part of the owners of the tubes to dispose of their property to the Government, in my judgment, is clearly due to three causes:

First. Shrewd business men that they are, they could readily see that the tube was fast becoming obsolete as a means of mail transportation and that it would soon be supplanted by other and more expeditious means. This being true, they well knew that at the expiration of the rental contracts a favorable report in writing from three postal officials could not be obtained, as required by law before the advertisement should issue, and therefore the rental contracts could not be renewed.

Second. As the franchises under which the tubes operate are either revocable or will expire within a few years, and in one case the property reverts to the city, the owners naturally were anxious to dispose of the tubes before this occurred.

Third. They also knew that the physical condition of the plants was deteriorating, and that within a few years at the most practically the entire system would have to be rebuilt or abandoned.

This being the case, it can readily be seen why every influence possible has been exerted by the owners of the tubes to unload onto the Government this property which, within a few years, unless entirely rebuilt, will become junk. As I stated in my minority report, in view of their inefficiency, and the destruction, damage, and delay which they cause to an enormous quantity of letters, I can not too strongly urge that the present tube systems be not only not purchased by the Government but that their use be discontinued entirely. I wish to state, however, that I am very much in favor of an underground system which will transport all mail of all classes in the congested districts of large cities, but I am not in favor of the purchase by the Government of an obsolete toy, which the present pneumatic-tube system is.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Speaker, one of the recent speakers against the purchase of the pneumatic tubes opened his remarks by the assertion that none of the postmasters of the cities of the United States who knew anything was in favor of the tubes. The gentleman was probably not familiar with the testimony of Mr. E. M. Morgan, for 40 years in the Postal Service of the United States and until recently postmaster of New York City. In his letter of November 27, 1915, to the chairman of the committee on pneumatic-tube service, Washington, D. C., he said:

> The advantages of the pneumatic-tube system in this city are felt throughout the entire Postal Service of the country, by making possible later and more expeditious dispatches of outgoing domestic and foreign mail, as well as the rapid transmission of incoming mails, both of domestic and foreign origin.

Those were the sentiments of Mr. Morgan at that time and are his sentiments to-day. It is not necessary to speak of the reputation he acquired as the most efficient postmaster that New York City ever had.

I wish to present this question to the House not merely as a question of postal economy, but as one involving the business welfare of the entire Nation. Congress discovered last winter, in the midst of our unprecedented cold spell, that the port of New York was not merely a local convenience but was a great national institution. We found that when, through the lack of foresight of the Coal Administrator, sufficient coal was not being forwarded to the port of New York to meet the demands of commerce, and the cold weather brought on the crisis, manufacturers and producers all over the United States were injured by this critical delay in the greatest port of distribution on the Western Hemisphere. And I think that it was a realization of the fact that the port of New York was the common property of all the great United States and essential for our national welfare that made the House of Representatives vote so emphatically in favor of the 40-foot channel for its waters. In the same manner I think that a realization by the House of the fact that the postal system of New York City concerns the Nation and not the mere inhabitants of the place will prompt the House to view the question of pneumatic tubes in a liberal light. Just as it is true that the port of New York must be kept open to insure the welfare of the country, so it is true that the postal transportation facilities in New York City must be kept at their maximum capacity to insure the successful operation of the business affairs of the Nation, which to a great extent center there. The attitude of the city and State of New York on the question of the retention of these pneumatic tubes is very clear. On April 12, 1918, the Legislature of the State of New York passed the following resolution:

[State of New York, in Senate.]

ALBANY, April 12, 1918.

By Mr. Cromwell:

Whereas this legislature's action more than 25 years ago made possible the underground mail and parcel transportation which the metropolis enjoys and which all other cities of the State may also possess under the franchise granted by this body; and

Whereas the sentiment of New York, like that of the other large cities of the country where this modern mail-tube system has been tested, is emphatically in favor of it, as indicated by the press, and by public expression, by the great business organizations, and by the public generally: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concurs), That this legislature associates itself with the public's progressive enlightened demand for the retention and extension of such service as a necessity of the post office and a relief to the congestion of the already overcrowded thoroughfares of our larger cities; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Vice President and Speaker of the House for presentation to Congress.

By order of the senate.

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

In assembly, April 12, 1918.

Concurred in without amendment by order of the assembly.

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

On December 20, 1917, the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York passed the following resolution:

Whereas despite the fact that the postal service in the city of New York shows an excess of approximately $20,000,000 of receipts above expenditures annually, the Postmaster General in his annual report for 1917 urges that the pneumatic mail service of this city be discontinued and automobile service be substituted therefor, and has recommended no item for the continuance of such pneumatic-tube mail service in the postal appropriation bill now pending before Congress:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York that the pneumatic mail service now existing in this city is not only indispensable to the prompt and uninterrupted movement of letter mail but is also desirable as a means of lessening traffic congestion and danger, and that the abolition of that service would be seriously detrimental to the residents of this city, especially to the business interests.

Resolved further, That this board protests against the proposed curtailment of the city's mail facilities and urges upon Congress that a sufficient appropriation be made to continue the pneumatic mail-tube service.

The Merchants Association of the city of New York has repeatedly taken action in favor of the retention of the tube. I have only recently received the following telegram from it:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 7, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE BLINN FRANCIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The retention of the pneumatic-tube mail service in this and other cities will come before the House for final vote Monday afternoon. The retention of this service is vital not only to this city but to speed of mail service throughout the entire country. We urge you to be present on Monday and vote to retain the tubes.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK.

As long ago as January 4, 1917, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York took action in favor of the pneumatic tubes and passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York herewith reaffirms its conviction in the advisability of continuing pneumatic-tube mail contracts as they apply to Greater New York of a scope of service not less than the existing facilities, and on such terms as may insure to this highly concentrated postal district the best available facilities for reducing local congestion, maintaining speed of transmission, and continuing the capacity of the New York post office to render satisfactory service to the business community. And we emphatically protest against any proposal to curtail the facilities afforded by the pneumatic tubes.

The first of this week I received a telegram from the borough president, which I believe unquestionably expressed the sentiment of the borough of Manhattan:

NEW YORK, June 5, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE B. FRANCIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In the name of borough of Manhattan and its great commercial and financial interests I appeal to you to make every effort to have retained in Post Office appropriation bill now in conference the provision for retention of pneumatic-tube mail service. This service now connects stations in this important section of the city, and suspension would be deplorable. Abandonment of pneumatic-tube service would result not only in harm to business interests but would increase danger from motor vehicles and add to present war-time congestion in principal highways.

FRANK L. DOWLING,
President Borough of Manhattan.

It would unduly lengthen the RECORD if I should insert all the favorable communications I have received from the city of New York with respect to the tubes. The situation from the local point of view is well expressed in an editorial of the New York Times, Saturday, June 1, 1918, in which it says:

The entire country has a grievance against the Post Office, but New York's grievance is greatest. The Post Office makes greater profits in this city than it does in the entire country, if it can be said really to make any true profits on a real accounting. Yet the department will not, if it can help it, allow this city to have the use of tubes which are said to carry 10,000,000 of the city's 20,000,000 letters daily. The department does not produce evidence of dissatisfaction with the tube service anywhere, and there is almost unlimited evidence of satisfaction to all except to the Post Office. Yet New York is to be deprived of its tubes, which earn their keep so handsomely, if the department can manage it.

I wish to appeal particularly to those Members of the House who are not as familiar as I am with the traffic congestion of the streets of New York not to be misled by the argument that post-office automobiles can always make sufficient speed to make connections, or that all that they need is the right of way over other traffic in order to give the Postal Service all the necessary expedition. Fifteen minutes casual observation of the mass of traffic on Broadway or on Fifth Avenue would convince anyone that the possession of the right of way over all other forms of traffic is of dubious value. Where the streets and avenues are crowded, as we all have seen them who live in New York, hour after hour with an absolutely unceasing line of traffic, the only conveyance that could overcome this congestion is an aeroplane. It is in fact impossible for postal automobiles, regardless of their traffic rights, to maintain a high or effective speed in the city streets, and when they attempt to do so they do it to the constant peril of hundreds of thousands of pedestrians who are constantly moving along the highways. It was demonstrated as long ago as 1915 that it was impossible for automobiles to make connections at certain portions of the year, particularly in the winter months. I quote the following testimony of Postmaster Morgan before the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads:

Mr. MORGAN. * * * The number of train connections missed and consequent delay to mails during December, 1915, and January, February, and March, 1916, due to irregularities in mail-wagon (auto) service occasioned by snow storms and resultant congested and slippery streets, was as follows:

December, 1915	30
January, 1916	8
February, 1916	51
March, 1916	120
Total	209

The CHAIRMAN. They missed the trains?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; notwithstanding they were given 30 minutes headway.

The Merchants Association of the city of New York has during the winter months of this year made further investigation of deliveries by mail autos to trains, which has confirmed these earlier figures. I insert them at length in the RECORD, because they are so convincing.

Partial list of failures of mail autos during specified days in January, February, March, and April, 1918, to connect with outgoing trains.

During the last month the Rules Committee of the House has been taking testimony in hearings held upon a resolution introduced by me in Congress calling for the investigation of the Post Office Department, particularly with reference to delays arising out of the ineffective Railway Mail Service. In those hearings it was clearly brought out, chiefly through witnesses representing the Merchants' Association of the City of New York, that mails are not dispatched with former frequency; that they are not fully worked in transit; that much unworked mail is turned into the terminal stations and there materially delayed; and that insufficiency in the number of railway postal cars, their withdrawal from a great number of routes throughout the United States, and the reduction of their crews are the main causes of the present breakdown of the postal service in the United States. That this service has constantly been deteriorating in the last six years can not be disputed. The morale of the men in the service has been impaired by illtreatment, the Railway Mail Service has become more inefficient by the use of the space system and the introduction of terminal postal stations, and we now have the attempt of the Postmaster General to deal a final blow at post-office efficiency by removing the pneumatic tubes. These are absolutely essential for the business welfare of the Nation. A policy which would take the tubes out of New York City is as short-sighted as a policy that would let New York Harbor fill up with mud and sand; and I appeal to the enlightened sentiment of the House to preserve them as a matter of national necessity.

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want it assumed that I speak, except in a degree, for the city of New York, because I represent only 18 election districts in that great city, as my own district of Long Island adjoins the metropolis. But because many of my constituents are engaged in active business in New York, and due primarily to the fact, beyond dispute, that whatever affects the center of the Nation's business activities affects every business man in every district in the Union. I feel it incumbent upon me to rise here and protest against any action which might deprive our city of the pneumatic-tube service which has rendered such signal benefit during the years it has been in operation. This matter should not be viewed in the narrow light of sectionalism or local prejudice, but in that broad spirit of nationalism which spells advancement and progress to all parts of the country.

New York is your city as well as ours. You have contributed to her greatness and share in her glory as the premier city of the world. Her barometer of trade affects you as well as us, and the postal facilities of New York are nearly as important to your merchants as to ours, for the great bulk of the mail handled in the New York post office is interstate in its nature. The advantages of the tube system in New York are felt throughout the entire postal service of the Nation, for it makes possible later and more expeditious transmission of foreign and domestic mail, interstate as well as intrastate, both incoming and outgoing.

The pneumatic-tube service is a physical expression of the evolution of the times; a utility of efficiency. It means speed in the transmission of the mail, and rapidity in the transmission of commercial communications means success to the man who possesses it and failure to the man who has it not. I desire to recount an experience which was related to me by a personal friend in reference to transit upon the streets of New York about three weeks ago. My friend in an automobile endeavored to go from Eighty-eighth Street to Thirty-fourth Street upon Broadway. On account of the congestion of traffic at that time—and it is not an unusual condition—1 hour and 15 minutes were consumed in making the short trip, which should have been made in one-fourth the time. Mail wagons, while certain traffic concessions are made them, are also subject to delay caused by the congestion of our streets.

It has been contended here that the pneumatic-tube service, if abandoned, would only mean an increase of 1½ per cent, perhaps, in the number of automobiles now used upon the streets to carry the mail at present transported through the tubes. Whether it is 1½ per cent or 10 per cent, any increase in the traffic upon the streets of New York is a direct disadvantage to our people and a direct danger to every man, woman, and child who uses those streets. Every effort to-day should be made to take away from the streets all of the transportation that we possibly can, and we should not increase it by even 1 per cent.

I understand that the pneumatic-tube system of the greater city consists of approximately 27 miles of double 8-inch tubing, and that there are transmitted daily through the medium of this service about 80,000 containers carrying some 5,000,000 pieces of first-class mail. Let me here quote from Mr. Morgan, former postmaster of New York:

> Each carrier has a capacity of about 450 ordinary-size letters, or about 250 large-size letters. These carriers are dispatched at the rate of six and four per minute, respectively. The tubes are operated from 4 a. m. to 11 p. m. The carriers travel at the rate of 30 miles per hour.
> It is the opinion of this office that the continuance of the entire existing system of the pneumatic tubes in this city is justified because of the rapid service which it provides for the transmission of mail of the first class. If the tube service was replaced by wagon service it would, I believe, be far from satisfactory, and would result in overwhelming complaint from the public and adverse criticism of the service.

From the testimony of Mr. Morgan 85 per cent of the first-class mail matter handled by the New York office is transmitted through these tubes, and unless some means are provided to continue their use it will cause hardships to the commercial and industrial concerns of the entire country. As to the price paid for their use when operated by private parties or the price to be paid by the Government as a public utility, I am not prepared to speak. I have no interest whatever in the company which owns the tubes and am not concerned with that phase of the question at all, except to see that the amount paid by the Government shall be reasonable and just. I am satisfied with the honesty, integrity, and disinterestedness of the congressional committee which investigated the matter, five out of six of whom reported in favor of the Government purchasing the tubes, and am content to abide by their decision.

Mr. Speaker, in view of all the testimony that has been presented by the great business organizations of New York, supported by the statement of its former postmaster, we plead for a rapid and delay-free transmission of our mails. Upon it depend the prosperity of business and the convenience of commerce. The necessity of trade warrants it, and the security and safety of our citizens upon the highways demand that the pneumatic-tube system shall not be supplanted by street service.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SIEGEL was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this question of the purchase of the pneumatic tubes has never been before the House for its consideration before. At the close of the last Congress a commission was appointed, consisting of three Members of the House and three of the Senate, who were authorized to investigate the tube service and to make such recommendations as they might think to the advantage of the service. They have made that investigation. The understanding at the time of their appointment was that this commission would report at the beginning of the present session. The commission did not report until after the House had passed the Post Office appropriation bill. So the House had no opportunity whatever to consider the report of the commission. The report was not made until after the Senate began the consideration of the appropriation bill. The Senate included in the appropriation bill the recommendation of the commission. The recommendation of the commission is that the Government of the United States shall purchase the pneumatic tubes that are now operating for the transmission of mail in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis. The upset price fixed by the commission and recommended by the Senate to the House in amendment, known as amendment 23, is $4,432,622. There is a provision in that recommendation to the effect that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be required to ascertain whether the price fixed in amendment 23, namely, $4,432,622, is an equitable price. And in authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the value of the tubes the provision directs that they shall ascertain this value from data now on file, and then report their findings before the 1st of July, 1918. I want to remind gentlemen here that this is the 13th of June, and any authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain values of property said to be valued at practically $5,000,000 between now and the 1st of July is nothing more or less than a farce.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman knows that an amendment is to be offered to make it November instead of July.

Mr. MADDEN. "The gentleman" does not know it except by the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am dealing with the case before the House and not what is in the mind of any gentleman. I am not supposed to be able to read what is in the mind of any man.

Mr. MASON. If the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield. If the gentleman is going to say that I heard some one state it, I deny it.

Mr. MASON. I am not going to make any statement if the gentleman does not want me to.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is, Should the Government of the United States own the tubes? And if we admit, for the sake of the argument, that the Government ought to own and operate them, the question is, What should be paid for them? Should the Government pay $4,432,622, or what sum should it pay? How do they ascertain the value of the tubes to be $4,432,622? By the report said to result from an investigation made by Stone & Webster, consulting engineers. Personally I am not in favor of accepting the report of any consulting engineers, no matter whether it is Stone & Webster or anybody else, as long as the United States has instrumentalities of its own upon which it can base action.

What instrumentalities has the Government of the United States? It has the Interstate Commerce Commission, consisting of men who have been educated in the work of ascertaining values and dealing with transportation facilities. We have taken away a large amount of the duties and responsibilities from the Interstate Commerce Commission since we turned the railroad management over to the President of the United States, and the result is that the Interstate Commerce Commission will have plenty of time and plenty of employees to engage in a comprehensive investigation of the value of these tubes; first, as an instrumentality for the expeditious movement of the mail; second, as to the utility of the tubes in the conduct of the Post Office Department; third, as to the value of the tubes in dollars, without respect to the utility of the instrumentality as a postal facility; fourth, whether the tubes themselves—that is, the pipes—have deteriorated to any material extent since they have been placed in the ground as a result of electrolysis; and, fifth, whether the licenses under patents are of such a nature as to be able to be taken over by the Government of the United States to the exclusion of anyone else, and whether the franchises under which the tubes are operated in the various cities cover a sufficient period of time to justify the Government of the United States in making this enormous investment.

Now, it seems to me that before we foreclose the right of investigation and declare in favor of purchasing the utility we ought to have the opinion of an unprejudiced instrumentality such as the Interstate Commerce Commission is. I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be given plenty of opportunity to make the investigation. I believe that if the people of the United States feel that the tubes are of great advantage to them they ought to have them. I believe that there ought to be a disposition on the part of all concerned to meet this issue fairly, and, above all, I believe that we ought not under any circumstances to foreclose the proposition of investigation by voting to purchase at a price which we are unable to say is fair or just to the Government.

What knowledge have we of the fairness of the price fixed in this bill? For myself I say I have no knowledge whaever, and my opposition to the adoption of amendment 23 does not necessarily mean that I do not want my people in Chicago to have every postal facility which they think they ought to have. But I do say it does mean that, whether they ought to have the facilities or not, personally I am responsible to my own conscience for my vote, and I am not going to vote to pay out of the Public Treasury $4,432,622 without having any knowledge whatever as to whether that vote is right or wrong. I propose to find out for myself. For, after all, as the years go by, I will have to answer to my own conscience. I will not be speaking on the floor of this House for a constituency all the time, but I will be compelled to live with myself as long as God lets me live, and while I am living with myself I want to feel that I am in respectable company. [Applause.] I insist upon the right of the most unprejudiced and most worthy body of investigators to furnish the information upon which I shall cast my vote on this question. Therefore I say that I want this question referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission for investigation.

Then the question arises whether, while the Interstate Commerce Commission is investigating this postal facility, it shall be discontinued. I apprehend that there is sufficient integrity of purpose and sufficient disposition on the part of the men who will finally have to shape the language of the provision for the instrumentalities that we are considering now to reach some satisfactory conclusion upon whether the tubes shall or shall not be continued in the service. The conferees will be charged with the responsibility of giving further consideration to this question if the House disapproves of the pending amendment. If the House in its wisdom shall conclude that the conferees shall not be given further right to consider, they will, of course, adopt the Senate amendment and that will foreclose the whole question, and with its foreclosure you will have obligated the Government to an expenditure of $4,432,622 without any knowledge on your part as to whether it is right or wrong.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that these franchises exist over a sufficient period of time to give plenty of time for investigation?

Mr. MADDEN. There ought not to be any great length of time required to investigate. Six months would be sufficient. At any rate, there could be no harm in giving the Interstate Commerce Commission six months, and I would be willing to say to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "Investigate and recommended, and when you have investigated and recommended I shall feel that you will have done justice to the case, and I am willing to vote for your recommendation." So, Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of whether we are to continue the tubes or not. This is a question of whether we are going to buy them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not this Senate amendment provide for an Interstate Commerce Commission investigation?

Mr. MADDEN. It does—an Interstate Commerce Commission investigation of two weeks, and it limits the question of the investigation to the data now on file—an insult to the commission and to Members of Congress who want to know for themselves whether the facts are as stated or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that an amendment is to be offered extending the time?

Mr. MADDEN. I have just heard the gentleman from Massachusetts say so. He assumed that I knew that. I did not know it. I do not know it now from what he says.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would seem to answer the gentleman's suggestion about the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want even the Interstate Commerce Commission to have the right to investigate with a provision that when they get through investigating we will have to purchase whether we want to purchase or not. That is the story.

I want the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate without tying the Congress up to the purchase. I want the Interstate Commerce Commission to be free to investigate, free to recommend, and after they have made the investigation and the recommendation I want the Congress of the United States to be free to act, and does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] assume to say that with any investigation made by the Interstate Commerce Commission under this provision of the bill, whether it is extended to November or not, the Congress will ever be called upon to act again? They have already foreclosed the right to act. Does not the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The idea is that confidence shall be placed in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MADDEN. The idea of placing confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commission after we have already declared for the purchase is absurd.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows there have been several reports upon this subject.

Mr. MADDEN. I know there have, but they have been so conflicting that nobody knows what they mean, and personally I am opposed to asking any respectable body of investigators to report upon a question that has already been foreclosed.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. It was stated upon the floor here, I believe, or in the report, that the ownership would revert to one of the cities in the period of, I think, five years.

Mr. MADDEN. In the city of Chicago the terms of the franchise provide that at the end of the franchise the property belongs to the city.

Mr. JUUL. Then what has the company or the owners of the tube system got to sell if, for instance, the Chicago tube system will belong to the city?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I want the Interstate Commerce Commission to find out. That is the reason why I want to send it to them for a de novo investigation, without any strings tied to it and without any commitment on the part of Congress in advance to purchase. So that now we have before us not the question of the operation of the pneumatic tubes, not the question of whether this instrument is a facility that ought to be in the Postal Service, but the question of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to investigate the question of the payment of $4,432,622, and giving, as a perfunctory appearance, the right to the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate a thing we have already closed.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. I want to say I am very much in sympathy with what the gentleman has said. I think he intimated that he would accept the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to the value of these tubes.

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly; if they get the right to investigate.

Mr. WELLING. A commission already appointed, as I understand it, has investigated.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. A commission of Congress. Is there any assurance that the Interstate Commerce Commission will make a fairer or more impartial investigation than has already been made?

Mr. MADDEN. There is only one thing certain. The Interstate Commerce Commission is a Government instrumentality; it has no object, can have no object, in making this investigation except to ascertain the facts.

Mr. WELLING. The gentleman would not assume——

Mr. MADDEN. I did not say the commission did. I say that any outside engineer which must be employed by any commission from the membership of this House or the Senate must of necessity employ men, regardless of whether they know they are prejudiced or not. I do not say that Stone & Webster are prejudiced. I have not said so. I do not say they are not good engineers. I do not say that they do not understand how to reach values. I deny that anybody can reach the conclusion that I have charged or intimated any prejudice on the part of the commission we have appointed. I would be the last man in the world to do that, because I have the greatest confidence in them. But we have the instrumentality of a Government agency. They are educated in the work of investigating this kind of facility, and their judgment will be absolutely unbiased, unprejudiced, and uninfluenced.

Mr. WELLING. I assume, if I may be permitted, that the Interstate Commerce Commission in the investigation of this problem would be forced to employ the services of expert engineers.

Mr. MADDEN. They have them on their pay roll. They are permanent fixtures.

Mr. GALLAGHER. And they have them in the Government?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; the Interstate Commerce Commission has engineers dealing with engineering problems, dealing with problems of Government, dealing with problems of transportation, and understanding the need for certain facilities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The report of the joint commission, composed of Senators and Representatives, includes the statement of Engineer Fry, who is connected with the Treasury Department, estimating the cost for reproducing the pneumatic-tube service of 1912, brought up to date, at $4,432,622, the amount mentioned in this amendment. The Interstate Commerce Commission may fix a lower valuation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like just one minute. Reproducing the present value under the worn-out condition of the tubes is a hard proposition; and I would like to get that from the Interstate Commerce Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I shall include in my remarks a portion of an editorial from the Washington Times upon this subject, in which they congratulate Representative ROUSE for filing a minority report and calling attention to what it believes to be an attempt to unload upon the Government some junk by the Pneumatic Tube Co. I shall also include a statement from the Chicago Tribune, in which it opposes this pneumatic-tube service deal and suggests that a pneumatic-tube lobby is here in Washington urging this legislation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have not the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman can not without unanimous consent include in his remarks editorials and clippings from newspapers.

Mr. HEFLIN. My statement is already in the RECORD. I mean the reference to the matter mentioned in the newspapers mentioned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is necessary to have unanimous consent.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent, then, Mr. Speaker, to print in the RECORD these statements.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman going to include an article from the New York Tribune relative to certain writings in the Hearst Magazine and papers?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is known that there is a lobby being maintained in Washington. I have had people to tell me that they have seen members of this lobby asking this Government to unload upon itself this worthless pneumatic-tube service. Gentlemen, it is repudiated by the postal experts of the Government by the chairman of the committee in this House, and by the report of Mr. ROUSE, of Kentucky, and by the postmasters where it is operated, and by the Post Office Department of the United States. Now, if you gentlemen want to vote for it in the face of the testimony submitted by Mr. ROUSE, and in the face of the statement of Mr. MOON, the chairman of the committee in the House, do so, and you will be this fall like the fellow who conceived the idea of obtaining some lead pipes without cost to himself. And that is where the "lead-pipe cinch" originated. He went where they were constructing a large building near a river. He had with him a little pal, and he said to him, "I observe that the laborers leave the building at noon and return at 1 o'clock, and we can supply ourselves with lead pipe." The pal said, "How are you going to take it away without being seen?" He replied, "I will wrap it around my body above my hips to my arms, and put this big overcoat on, button it up, and go down to the ferryboat, and over the river, and we will repeat that process each day." So he supplied himself with some lead pipe and walked slowly down to the river. When they reached the river the ferryboat was moving away. The little fellow ran and jumped into the boat, but the big fellow jumped, missed the boat, and went down into 20 feet of water. The ferryman ran up with a pole in hand and said, "Everybody stand back." The little pal, with tears rolling down his face, said, "What are you holding the pole for?" The ferryman said for him to catch it when he comes up. The little pal said, mournfully, "He will never come up." [Applause and laughter.]

Gentlemen, in view of the minority report of Mr. ROUSE, of Kentucky, and the statement of Mr. MOON, of Tennessee, the chairman of the committee in the House, with the testimony in this case, with the testimony of the postal experts, of the postmasters where this thing is operated, and with the repudiation of the Postmaster General, if you tie this pneumatic-tube junk deal about your body, why, this fall, when you jump at the election boat on the river of honest electorates, you will miss it and go down, as did the lead-pipe fellow, and your friends will stand and say, "No use to hold the pole out, boys; by golly, he's gone." [Applause and laughter.]

Now, do you know what you had better do? You had better do what old Uncle Rufus said he was going to do with the turtle. He caught a big, fat, soft-shell turtle, weighing about 20 pounds, and as he was coming away from the river the turtle had his neck stretched out looking about at his new surroundings. Uncle Rufus said to him, "Do you know what I'm gwine to do? I sho am gwine to eat you." Just then he met a tramp who was also a ventriloquist. He asked Uncle Rufus for the turtle, but Uncle Rufus said, "Oh, no, sir;" and walking on, he said, "I sho am gwine to eat dis turtle." The ventriloquist threw his voice and from about the turtle's mouth these words came: "What is that you say you are going to do to me?" Whereupon Uncle Rufus said to him, "Do you know what I'm gwine to do? I sho to drap you right here." [Applause and laughter.]

Gentlemen, do you know what you had better do with this pneumatic-tube service? You had better drap it right here. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN].

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I am reminded, after listening to the gentleman from Alabama who has just concluded his remarks, of what I believe was his experience while on a moose-hunting trip in the State of Maine. Suddenly his guide discovered before them a doe and a buck, and immediately asked which Mr. HEFLIN preferred to shoot, and he immediately replied: "You shoot the doe; I shall shoot the bull. [Laughter.] And he added, "Because I best know how to shoot the bull." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, I have listened attentively to the debate on the retention and purchase of the pneumatic tubes, which question is now before us for consideration, and it appears to me that it has now resolved itself into a discussion of expert accountants. There have been innumerable figures quoted. Thus far the gentlemen have lost sight of the human and utility features connected with the problem.

We have listened to a dissertation from the conscientious gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and there is no man in this House whom I respect more for his character and ability, but, unfortunately, through a remark of his made by him on the floor he has unwittingly made me an outlaw, and I find myself without the pale. He earnestly stated that in order to keep his conscience clear he could not vote for the amendment in question, for if he did he was sure that his conscience would not be in the state he preferred. I am going to vote for the amendment, and I claim equal standards of conscientious ideals as the gentleman from Illinois.

Referring to the question of figures and the expense entailed in the purchase or retention of the pneumatic-tube system, it may be permitted and tolerated that a man from New York be allowed to say a word. I do not know that I am so strong for the purchase of this tube system; but I do know that I am strongly and absolutely convinced that this service is swift, continuous, safe, efficient, and dependable, and that it should be retained in operation.

The question resolves itself into a contest between two rival modes of transporting the mail. New York City is the clearing house of nearly all the domestic mail and the greater part of the foreign mail, and so the question before us is not one of a local character, but really one of a national aspect. It concerns and affects nearly every State in the Union as to the quick delivery and receipt of the mails.

This system was created and instituted for the carrying of first-class letter mail, and it is marvelous with what effect and dispatch it has solved this great problem. By a nonresident it is frequently thought that the postal matters in New York are operated from one or two stations. The fact is, however, that there are 26 miles of tubes and 26 stations from which they are operated.

The installation of the pneumatic-tube service was first suggested in 1889 by Hon. John Wanamaker, then Postmaster General. In 1893 an appropriation of $10,000 was given to experiment on the proposition, and in Philadelphia the first tube was installed. It was one-half mile in length. Since that time the tube service, with the exception of the period 1901–2, has expanded, and to-day it is more than 56 miles in length. These tubes dispatch every six to eight minutes 500 letters, at the rate of 30 miles an hour, for 20 hours during the day, to the 26 stations on Manhattan Island, taking 35 minutes in delivery from the general post office to the northern limit of the service at Station J, West One hundred and twenty-fifth Street. This same distance traversed by mail auto trucks occupies two and one-half hours.

A metropolis like the city of New York, with its vast volume of business transactions, demands that the mail be dispatched with the utmost speed and continuity. The pneumatic-tube service provides for these requisites admirably. The Government, banks, and commercial institutions demand not only the retention of this service, but also its extension to Harlem, Washington Heights, and The Bronx. The gentlemen advocating the dismemberment and abolishment of this service for a substitution of mail trucks urge that the expense saved thereby is the main element, and the only one, which should be given consideration. This I deny. To be sure, the contention has a strong element of thrift in its favor, but there is the human and efficiency side that far outweighs the amount of money that would be saved.

New York, with its 6,000,000 population and its 3,000,000 licensed vehicles, is now overcrowded. The island of Manhattan, which is but 2¼ miles long and 12 miles wide, is the most congested city in the United States, and has 1,000,000 children attending its schools. The traffic is so congested that it has spent and is now spending millions of dollars in the construction of subways to relieve this congestion, and has spent thousands of dollars in widening its streets and removing encroachments therefrom. The density of its traffic is renowned the world over, and at Fifty-ninth Street and Broadway, which is regarded as comparatively uptown, there pass 39,800 autos every 10 hours. It is estimated that one auto mail truck equals in hazard 10 commercial or private autos, for the reason that it is given "right of way," and policemen subconsciously allow it to pass at an unreasonable rate of speed.

It would be impossible in a city such as New York, with its ever-increasing and congested traffic, for mail auto trucks to proceed with any degree of schedule time or regularity under normal weather conditions, and would be absolutely noneffective during abnormal weather conditions, when the snow would impede them, as was the experience last winter and in 1914, when the city was snowbound for two days and all vehicular traffic suspended.

The trucks would have to attempt to attain a sufficient high degree of speed for connecting with departing trains and boats, and the lives of the children would be constantly in danger. Statistics of the traffic division of the police department disclose that one person is killed every 14 hours and one is injured every 23 minutes, and that trucks, and especially mail trucks, cause the greater part of these fatalities and injuries.

There is some talk of a lobby in the tube matter, and some talk of a lobby in the auto matter. Personally I do not believe such nonsense, and will not be alarmed until I am shown proof regarding it. If there is one, it is not the first one, and if there is going to be one created, as is intimated, in the purchase of the auto mail trucks it will probably not be the last one.

The crux of the situation to-day is, Do the cities of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, and St. Louis demand the retention of this service? I can speak advisedly for the city of New York, and let me say to you gentlemen who cry "lobby" that a lobby may be able to influence some of the Members of Congress, but I deny that any lobby can influence, affect, or control the decision of the great civic bodies of such a character as the New York Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants' Association of New York, and the other commercial institutions that have declared themselves unreservedly for the retention and extension of the postal pneumatic-tube service in the city of New York.

Gentlemen, are you going to Alabama to find out what the city of New York demands in this regard? When the question of the price of a commodity such as cotton or oil is to be discussed, considered, or regulated in this body, do you gentlemen come to me, a New Yorker, and ask my opinion as to its production and commercial value? Of course you do not. Neither do I go to the gentlemen from Alabama and ask as to the regulation and disposal of oil. I go to the gentlemen of the South who raise cotton, and rely on their judgment, and go to the gentlemen from Oklahoma for matters to be known about oil, and this is just as I should do.

No matter how sincere and earnest the gentleman from Alabama may be, it may be that he has never seen New York and never has seen the operation of the system which he now desires to annihilate, and therefore I do not believe that he has the least idea of the efficiency and demand for this service, for it can only best be judged by the fact that it is the desire of all the people of the city of New York, its civic and commercial organizations, and that its congressional delegation demand that it be retained.

I would recall to the attention of the gentlemen who urge the abandonment of this service the fact that we take the people in the city of New York and transport them underground in swarms, so that they will not be injured or delayed in the traffic of the street, and yet these men now opposing the retention of this service demand that we take the letters out of the tubes and give them air and transport them through the streets, while we continue to transport our people underground. Is there anything more senseless than that? [Applause.]

In conclusion I would urge that this service be retained, so that the lives and limbs of the people of New York shall be saved, and that the saving of a few dollars be not made weightier than the lives and blood of innocent children.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER], and I wish that I had more time to yield, but I have not.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to thank the distinguished chairman of the committee for this allotment of time, this valuable three minutes, and for the valuable cooperation of the ranking Republican Member [Mr. STEENERSON], who is so very cautious in allotting the time. I may not be familiar with the manipulation of time in the House of Representatives, but I am familiar with some of the conditions that exist in the best city that God's sun shines on—my native city, where I first saw the light of day—and I am the only Member from New York City on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I am familiar with the conditions that exist in that city, inasmuch as my training has been along commercial lines, and I am not affiliated in any way with professions, part of whose business probably is the apt discussion of these things. Having resided in the original city of New York, county of New York, and in the Borough of Manhattan, I devoted much time to solving this problem, and it is a problem. It is a question of the mail service of this Empire City, not only the metropolis of this country but practically the metropolis of the world, first in business and, I think, by accurate estimates, first in population. We simply want the best mail service.

The Post Office Department in the city of New York employs two methods in the transportation of mail—(1) motor trucks and (2) pneumatic tubes—and the question in reality at issue is, "Shall the use of pneumatic tubes be discontinued and light automobile trucks substituted in their place?

The safe and speedy transmission of mail is essential to the commercial, financial, and social life and progress of the people of the city of New York. Realizing this vital condition, the New York Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants' Association, the maritime, produce, and all other exchanges, the banks and trust companies, the great New York press, and all the civic bodies that devote so much time and energy without any selfish purpose—all these have given earnest and serious study leading to the solution of this problem. They are united in the belief that the city of New York absolutely requires a complete, extensive, and efficient pneumatic-tube system of mail delivery, that both systems of mail transportation—the light automobile truck and the pneumatic tube—should be maintained with the highest degree of efficiency, and that either system should not take the place of the other, but that each should assist and supplement the other.

In New York City there are transmitted through pneumatic tubes about 80,000 pneumatic-tube carriers per day, carrying in round numbers about 5,000,000 pieces of mail. These carriers travel at the rate of 30 miles per hour from 4 a. m. until 11 p. m., and carry about 80 per cent of all first-class mail matter. The pneumatic-tube system should be in operation not from 4 a. m. to 11 p. m. on week days, but during every hour of every day.

The number of tubes connecting main and branch post offices and railroad terminals should be doubled, trebled, or quadrupled to accommodate all mail matter mailed and to lessen and, if possible, eliminate all delay. Tubes should be constructed of various widths for the dispatch of the different kinds of mail matter; it is obvious that the 8-inch tubes now in use are suitable for the transmission of first-class mail and special-delivery letters; tubes of 20 and 30 inches should be built to transmit the lower classes of mail matter and parcels. Geographically, New York is not separated from the cities across the Hudson—Jersey City, Hoboken, and Weehawken. These cities are so closely related as to form actually a part of the city of New York. The pneumatic-tube system should be extended in length to interconnect all parts of the city, not only the five great boroughs but also the adjacent cities of the State of New Jersey. If the profits of the Post Office Department in New York City exceed annually $20,000,000, surely enough money may be appropriated to own, to construct, and to operate a pneumatic-tube system that would adequately meet the necessities of the people of New York. The advantages of the pneumatic-tube system in New York City are felt throughout the entire Postal Service of the country, by making possible later and more rapid transportation of outgoing mail, domestic and foreign, as well as the speedy delivery of incoming mails.

What are the advantages of a comprehensive, complete, and extensive system of pneumatic tubes? A high rate of speed—higher than the speed of any other system—for the transportation of mail of the first importance, letters, daily and financial papers, and mail matter bearing special-delivery stamps. The congestion of surface traffic, storms, and other surface conditions which make the speedy transportation of mail matter by light automobile trucks impossible are avoided, and the happiness of people through the decrease in the number of vehicles and the consequent removal of danger from accident is increased. The mails can be dispatched to any point at any time. The more rapid handling of mail would lessen and eliminate damage to mail matter and loss by theft. I am of the opinion that it would be a difficult matter to demonstrate that the cost of operation of an efficient tube system would be equal to the cost of operation of a light automobile truck system.

New York City, therefore, appeals to this House to give this matter respectful consideration, and to be fair, reasonable, and just by giving it an up-to-date progressive method of transporting mail by a comprehensive tube system.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this time that the gentleman from Tennessee gives me. I am ashamed of this provision that the Senate has put on the Post Office appropriation bill. This report made by the commission, and this minority report made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE], if carefully read by any man, will make him reach the conclusion that this pneumatic-tube service is a failure, and for the Government to be put in the attitude of buying it and operating it is to be in the attitude of unloading a lot of useless and worthless junk on the taxpayers of the country.

The whole scheme is saturated with fraud. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] forgets that less than 5 per cent of the volume of mail carried in these stations where the tube service operates is carried in these pneumatic tubes. It costs 13½ cents for every letter that goes through one of them, according to the statement of the Postmaster General, and yet the gentleman from Minnesota has the temerity to argue to this House that it is not any more expensive than the other way. The whole business is nothing but an absolute "frame up" on the Government.

When do these franchises expire? The one in Boston can expire at any minute, because it is left with the city council. The one in New York City expires 4 years from now. The one at Chicago expires in 5 years, the one in St. Louis in 10 years, and no time is fixed in the one at Philadelphia. Yet the gentleman proposes this thing, involving an expense, according to the Postmaster General, of $11,432,000 for an original purchase price, to be scattered over a term of years that will go twice as long as New York City's franchise exists.

These concerns have no more title to these franchises than I have. You gentlemen might as well talk about their transferring to the Government a title to the Milky Way or the aurora borealis as to transfer a title to any franchise in New York City or in Chicago or St. Louis or Boston or Philadelphia.

That is made clear in the report of the commission; and yet the gentleman from Minnesota thinks that this Congress ought to unload on the taxpayers of this country this old worn-out junk. Gentlemen claim that the continuance of the pneumatic-tube system will not even cause any mail to be lost or damaged. As to that, look at this nasty stuff! It would not make rags. With such an exhibition as that before you, gentlemen tell you that these tubes would not destroy or damage any mail. [Laughter and applause.]

This pile of torn, soiled, and emasculated letters came out of some of these penumatic tubes that the gentleman from Minnesota urges the Congress to foist and fasten upon the United States Government. This exhibition of ruined mail is a positive contradiction of his statement that the mail that was injured is infinitesimal in transmission through these pneumatic tubes. The proof and all of the testimony presented in the report plainly and manifestly demonstrates that these pneumatic tubes are inefficient, virtually worn out, and would have to be replaced with new and larger tubes within a few years. A further fact has developed from the report of the minority, and that is that these pneumatic-tube corporations have no title to any franchise which they could transfer to the United States Government. No court of law would hold, neither would any court of equity maintain, that the unexpired terms of these franchises could lawfully be transferred to the United States Government or to any other party. Certainly it is manifest that the franchise in the city of Boston could be revoked at any time on order of the city council. As to New York City, the franchise expires in the year 1922, only four years hence. As to the city of Chicago, the franchise expires on the 12th of October, 1923. As to St. Louis, the expiration date is in June, 1928. So you can see, under the terms of the proposed sale to the Government, as adopted by the Senate in its amendment of the appropriation bill of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, that it is clear that these franchise rights would expire one in 4 years, one in 5 years, one in 10 years, and one at any time before it is proposed for the Government to acquire a title. Can any honest mind reach the conclusion that, as representatives of the people, we would be doing a good, right, clean, and honest thing to reach into the pockets of the people and take out $11,000,000 and give it to these pneumatic-tube corporations for a lot of old iron, tin, and leather, and a few accessories, fit for nothing except the scrap heap and junk pile, on the pretext that we give quick and efficient mail service to five cities of this country?

Gentlemen, the testimony and the proof show that it is not quick nor is it efficient service at all. On the contrary, the proof shows, and all the testimony establishes the fact, the Postmaster General asserts this fact, and all of the experts of the Post Office Department prove, that this tube service has limited capacity and is unreliable, and in many instances delays thousands of letters annually.

The same proof establishes beyond contradiction that these tubes are unreliable, due to breakdowns and stoppages of letters in the tubes that cause them to cease operation for hours and even days at a time, and it has been necessary to dig up the streets to get down to the tubes in order to open them and take out the clogged mail. The proof further shows that the defects and carelessness on the part of the operators and accidents to the tubes ruin thousands of letters. Now, my friends, in the face of this testimony and this incontrovertible proof, and in face of the violent objection of our able and splendid Postmaster General, the Hon. Albert S. Burleson, will this House adopt the Senate amendment and then fasten this fraudulent and useless and extravagant tube corporation upon the people who pay the taxes? Instead of hampering the administration, instead of hamstringing the able Postmaster General, who has administered the postal affairs in the most economical and efficient manner that the Government has ever before had, it appears to me that we should carry out his recommendation and the advice of his experts and kill this amendment and let this tube graft be a thing of the past. I have advocated and still maintain that the United States Government should own and operate the telegraph and telephone systems of this country, but when it comes to absorbing a useless and expensive burden that we know the pneumatic-tube corporations are I shall fight this "job work" of plunder as long as I have a voice in this Congress.

The people have a right to expect their Representatives in Congress to exercise due care and caution in the expenditure of all public moneys. Is there a man on this floor who would invest his own personal money in a pile of worn-out junk that the proof shows is a burden to operate with no prospects of receiving any dividends?

Why is it that the pneumatic tube corporations are so anxious to sell to the United States Government? Why is it that men who would holler themselves hoarse opposing that the Government own the telegraph and telephone systems of this country are now advocating that the Government buy this old pile of junk? Why is it that so many newspapers have shown such manifest interest as to advise the Congress of the great benefit in buying this worthless pile of scrap?

It must be manifest to the minds of every Member that the Pneumatic Tube Corporations are either not making any money or that they can not renew their franchise privileges on the date of expiration. Do you think these newspapers are carrying all of the advertisement for nothing? Do you think these interested persons are writing letters to Members of Congress for pleasure or for love? Two years ago, when this proposition was up to again renew rental contracts with these Pneumatic Tube Corporations, the chairman of the Post Office Committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, opposed it then, and by his side I spoke and voted against the waste of public funds incident to the renewal of these unholy contracts.

Now, we have coming from the other end of the Capitol this Trojan horse, which is proposed to be ridden roughshod over the people who pay the taxes. To my mind the path is plain. One road leads to the plundering and exploitation of the people in adopting this amendment of the Senate to place this burden on the people in order that these pneumatic tube corporations can get the taxpayers' money for a pile of junk, and the other road leads to the interest of the people to kill this amendment and bury it for all the time. Shall we stand with and for the administration and with the Postmaster General in his work to further increase the efficiency in the development of the mail service of this country or shall we slap the administration in the face and place stumbling blocks in the way of the Postmaster General by forcing upon him this useless system that will be a burden so long as it exists? There is no jury of 12 honest men in the United States who would hear all of the facts, all of the testimony, and all of the proof that would decide that it would be proper and a good thing for the benefit of the people of the United States Government to buy, own, and operate these pneumatic tubes in the mail service of these cities. The verdict of any jury would be to sustain the Postmaster General and his experts and kill this outrageous and abominable amendment. No man can serve two masters. I am for the people, and I am going to demonstrate it in this vote, as I do in all other legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the best argument advanced for the continuation and purchase of the pneumatic tubes has been advanced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], who positively showed that he does not know what he is talking about. [Laughter.] I do not think he ever saw a pneumatic tube, and I do not believe he would know one if he saw it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts know whether the gentleman from Mississippi has ever been in New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAGUE. No. I think he would be lost if he went to New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that the gentleman from Mississippi was influenced somewhat by that bundle of junk that was gathered up in the House Office Building? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAGUE. The opposition to this amendment is in keeping with the action of the committee of post-office experts who were sent by the Postmaster General to New York a short time ago to investigate the pneumatic-tube system, and when they arrived at New York they had to get a guide to show them where the pneumatic tubes were. The report made by them was so unfair that one of their number repudiated and condemned the report. [Laughter.]

I am in favor of the continuation of the pneumatic tubes as recommended by this report. Unless we accept the amendment offered by the Senate, immediately after July 1 the tubes are discontinued, no matter what those who are opposing it say.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Why will it be discontinued?

Mr. TAGUE. Because no money is carried in the appropriation bill, and therefore there is no provision for continuing it. This report deals with the proposed purchase. You heard the voice of the master, the Postmaster General, when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] stands up here and tells you what you should do. Let me say to that gentleman, that if we Members from the eastern cities follow the advice and counsel of the gentleman from Alabama there will be fewer Members on this side of the House when Congress convenes next year. His action is governed by the Post Office Department.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGUE. No; I have not the time. Otherwise, I would be glad to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TAGUE. The question, Mr. Speaker, is whether or not this Congress is willing to give to the business men of this country an opportunity to transact their mail business, as it should be, in a profitable and expeditious manner. Of all of the money collected from the postal resources of over $300,000,000, over one hundred million is collected in the cities that are now using the pneumatic-tube service, and yet not one single fair argument has been advanced for the discontinuance of that system. What is the argument? The only argument comes from the Postmaster General, who because he wants to punish some one, and for no other reason, tries to defeat this system. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have been in the post offices; I have been in the pneumatic-tube service rooms, and I have seen just such junk as that piled on the floor; and while I believe this exhibit was given by the Post Office Department to my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE], for whom I have great respect, I still contend that that rubbish never went through the pneumatic tube.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are telegraph blanks and things like that mixed up in it.

Mr. TAGUE. Yes; and paper bags and covers. A short time ago in my own city, in the city of Boston, one of the automobiles of the Government, loaded down with almost three tons of mail, went into the river, and it took the Post Office Department over two months to dry that mail out. The people who were waiting for their mail had to wait for that mail to dry out before it could be delivered to them. So it shows that no matter how careful people are, accidents will happen.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield, here is another bill that came out of that package. It is dated Chicago, March 3, 1917. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSE] says this was gathered up last week. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROUSE. I made no such statement. I said last month.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I accept the gentleman's amendment—last month. This is dated March 3, 1917.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, is this being taken out of my time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I believe the time has come in this country when the business interests should receive some consideration in the great appropriations and in the expenditure of money. Great communities like the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis have had this service for many years and desire its continuance. And I want to say that this pneumatic-tube service should be in the other large cities, and would be if the representatives of those cities knew what it would mean to the Postal Service of their cities. When the business men of these cities which now have pneumatic tubes come before this Congress and ask for an appropriation to continue a service which means so much to them in the way of promoting their business, they should be given at least a fair return in service for the revenue they return to the Government. They are not asking for a new service, but for a continuance of a transportation facility which has proven efficient and expeditious for over 20 years.

[From the New York Tribune, May 6, 1918.]

BUY THE MAIL TUBES.

Postmaster General Burleson's opposition to the mail tubes is as impenetrable as it is persistent. Whether or not his attempt to influence the Senate against the recommendation that the Government acquire the tubes was unfair, as Senators BANKHEAD, HARDWICK, and WEEKS insist, it overlooked too many essential points in the controversy to be deemed accurate.

There has been no official report against the use of the tubes, as these Senators point out, by any of the five congressional committees which at various times have investigated the desirability of maintaining them. None of Mr. Burleson's predecessors has taken the stand he takes. In the cities where the tubes are in use there is unanimous sentiment on the part of commercial and civic organizations and business men in general against the abandonment of the surest and most rapid method of transmitting first-class mail. Protest is invariably against the substitution for them of the uncertain automobile trucks, which add so much to the congestion and dangers of street traffic.

The latest investigation by a Congress committee was full and fair. The Post Office Department was adequately represented, and full consideration was given to Mr. Burleson's point of view. In the face of this the committee reported in favor of Government capture of the tubes, under proper safeguarding as to valuation and the terms of purchase. Under the circumstances this ought to be conclusive. The mail service is bad enough now. Business men all over the country are complaining of inordinate delay in the handling of their letters. If Mr. Burleson had his way, this delay, which now hampers the transaction of business and costs the merchants and bankers and manufacturers of the country much money, would become very much worse. The mail tubes are a necessity, not a luxury. If Congress deems them too costly when they are rented, its committee has pointed out the remedy.

[From the New York American, Apr. 22, 1918.]

A CROWNING APPEAL FOR THE PNEUMATIC-MAIL-TUBE SERVICE.

On Friday, April 12, the New York Legislature in Albany adopted a concurrent resolution which, in its environment and significance, should be most interesting to the Congress of the United States.

This resolution was passed without a dissenting vote by both the senate and the entire assembly of the Empire State. Its entire passage through both houses consumed but a single day. It was introduced by Senator Cromwell, a Republican, of Richmond. It was indorsed and seconded by Senator Wagner, a Democrat, of New York. It was voted unanimously by both Democrats and Republicans, by Tammany men and administration men, by Socialists and Independents, and not a single vote was recorded in opposition from first to last. Here is the joint resolution with its enlightening preamble:

"Whereas this legislature's action more than 25 years ago made possible the underground mail and parcel transportation which the metropolis enjoys and which all other cities of the State may also possess under the franchise granted by this body; and

"Whereas the sentiment of New York, like that of the other cities of the country where this modern mail-tube system has been tested, is emphatically in favor of it as indicated by the press and by public expression, by the great business organizations, and by the public generally: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this legislation associates itself with the public's progressive, enlightened demand for the retention and extension of such service as a necessity of the post office and a relief to the congestion of the already overcrowded thoroughfares of our larger cities; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Vice President and Speaker of the House for presentation to Congress."

Which has been done.

The city of New York, the city of Philadelphia, the city of Boston, the city of Chicago, and the city of St. Louis, speaking with extraordinary emphasis through their chambers of commerce, boards of trade, merchants' associations, public men, and through all their post-office officials, saving only those under the immediate direction of the Postmaster General, representing nearly 13,000,000 of the American people in the great centers of traffic which pay the great bulk of all the revenue which supports the Postal Department, and involving nearly one-sixth of the entire population of the United States, have definitely, decisively, and earnestly memorialized the Congress of the United States with the request that the fast underground pneumatic tube system for the mails should be perpetuated and extended.

It may be stated without any fear of contradiction that no such memorial, carrying such stately numbers, and with such emphatic representative earnestness, has ever made a request of the American Congress before that was not granted promptly and cordially.

And so was this memorial granted cordially and completely. Two Congresses of the United States, in both Houses, and two able and representative joint commissions, appointed by Congresses, after investigating all the facts and hearing all the evidence, responded to the request of the representative business men who made this appeal and passed resolutions perpetuating and extending the fast underground pneumatic system for the mails.

But against this overwhelming memorial, perhaps the most impressive ever presented to Congress, there has been opposed insistently and consistently the objection of the Postmaster General and his persistent opposition to the wish and the will of the Congress of the United States.

It is doubtful if ever before the will of a single officer of the Government, even the President, has persistently obstructed and thwarted the will of so many people so carefully and so respectfully expressed.

And now to this weight of testimony and appeal comes the sovereign Commonwealth of New York—the Empire State—the largest in wealth, in population, and in development in the Federal Union, and through its general assembly, speaking the unanimous request of both parties, makes one more gigantic appeal for what its business men know they wish, and know why they wish it, and express both the wish and the reason to the United States official in charge of this department, which was created to serve their interests and to do their will.

Now, there is no use to rail at the Postmaster General. There is nothing to gain by abusing him, and this newspaper has no desire to do either of these things.

But this newspaper, as one of those which from the beginning has advocated this progressive system of handling the United States mail in the greater cities, and which has had its place among the memorials and petitions which have respectfully gone in such overwhelming and representative numbers to the Postmaster General, must be permitted in the kindliest and most loyal way to express its astonishment and regret at the refusal which the Postmaster General has flung point blank into the faces of so many millions of American citizens.

It is enough to ask why—just why—the Postmaster General is not willing to answer the will of the people who are themselves so vitally involved. The Postmaster General is a Democrat. Many, if not most, of the official bodies that have spoken to him from these great cities are Democrats. The men from these cities are not stupid or ignorant.

Does the Postmaster General believe that these millions of men are ignorant and stupid and that after all these years they do not know what they wish?

Does the Postmaster General believe that these millions of men and these multitudes of official bodies and these five great cities and this great Empire State of New York are "corrupt" or "venal" or "prejudiced" or "bought" in these expressions of their judgment and their desire?

And if the Postmaster General does not so believe and is not willing to commit himself to this very unflattering if not insulting estimate of the public and private character of the memorialists, what are his reasons for denying and defying the expressed will of so many million sovereign citizens?

Mr. MOON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall support the proposition to do away with the appropriation for these pneumatic tubes. I have here a newspaper showing a sample of the way in which they are spending money in the daily papers of the country advertising pneumatic mail tubes as a war necessity.

After reading that I took up the matter with the Postmaster General's Office as to be advised what his department had done. My inquiry was answered by letter. I have here that reply and a copy of a letter from the Postmaster General to Senator BANKHEAD, chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee, and I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, how long is this letter?

Mr. RAKER. About three pages.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does this letter follow several visitations to the Capitol by the Postmaster General and other attachés of the department?

Mr. RAKER. I think not. He says in this letter——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman know that the Postmaster General is pretty clever himself at getting Members of Congress to support his propositions?

Mr. RAKER. He is sure bright, and to his credit. This is so just——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman state whether he has seen the Postmaster General around this building within the last week?

Mr. RAKER. I have not. I am sorry to say——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman seen him here displaying an interest in this bill at any time?

Mr. RAKER. I have not.

Mr. KING. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is fair to have the House know that the Postmaster General has been pretty busy.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still reserving the right to object, I want to know if the gentleman has the answer that Senator BANKHEAD wrote to that letter of the Postmaster General.

Mr. RAKER. I have not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That letter bears upon the action of the Senator, and unless the gentleman from California is willing to put in Senator BANKHEAD's answer——

Mr. RAKER. I will put it in if I can get it, though I understood that Senator BANKHEAD's answer has already been inserted in the RECORD by a Senator.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will object until the gentleman gets the answer. Let us play fair here. There are two sides to this question.

Mr. AYRES. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. RAKER subsequently obtained unanimous consent to insert the following letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, June 19, 1918.

Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAKER: I am handing you herewith copy of a letter which the Postmaster General addressed to Senator BANKHEAD on April 23, 1918, setting forth the reasons why the department believes the pneumatic tubes should be discontinued.

Sincerely, yours,

J. C. KOONS,
First Assistant Postmaster General.

APRIL 23, 1918.

Hon. J. H. BANKHEAD,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: The bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, carries an amendment beginning with line 14, on page 14, making an appropriation of $976,000 for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes, and provides for the purchase and operation of the tubes by the Government on and after July 1, 1918. The amendment also prescribes the method of purchase and fixes the maximum amount which can be paid for the properties at $4,432,622.

This amendment is not in the interest of the Postal Service, and I wish to vigorously protest against its enactment. My objections are based on the following reasons:

1. The tubes are unnecessary and a hindrance to efficient operation of the Postal Service. The volume of all classes of mail has so greatly increased and surface transportation so greatly improved, both as to speed and frequency, that the tubes are no longer of value. This is illustrated by the fact that in 1913 it was estimated that 5,375,147 letters were advanced daily through the use of the tubes, while in 1915 only 2,837,638, or about one-half, were advanced. No doubt this ratio of reduction has continued and, if so, there is now little or no mail advanced by the tubes, notwithstanding the fact that the screen-wagon schedules are arranged so as to secure the greatest advantage of the tubes.

2. Because of their limited capacity the tubes can not be used to meet emergent conditions, and for that reason delay millions of letters annually.

3. Because of their unreliability, due to breakdowns and stoppages, the tubes cease operation for hours and even days at a time, and it is often necessary to dig up the streets to obtain the mail clogged in the tubes. When this occurs it is necessary to immediately substitute vehicle service, which results in confusion of schedules, thereby disorganizing the transportation and delivery services and causing delay to large quantities of letter mail.

4. Because of defects, carelessness on the part of operators, and accidents, the tubes soil or damage thousands of letters each year, and in many instances entirely destroy others, thus resulting in many complaints and great inconvenience and loss to the public.

5. Less than 50 per cent of the letter mail, or 5 per cent of the entire volume of mail handled at the stations having pneumatic tubes, is transported by the tubes. If they were abandoned, practically all of this mail could be handled more expeditiously and at less than one-third the cost by other means, and large quantities of mail now delayed by tubes advanced.

6. Notwithstanding the small quantity of mail transported by tube, the cost per mile is more than the entire amount paid for carrying the mail on all railroads entering New York; three times as much as is paid those entering Boston; and one-sixth as much as the entire cost of the screen-wagon, automobile, city delivery, and collection vehicle service for all the cities of the United States.

7. The cost of transporting mail by tube is excessive and an extravagant waste of public funds. Investigation shows that in Philadelphia it costs approximately 13½ cents for each letter advanced by tube. What is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities. This is more expensive than special-delivery service.

8. Because of the unreliability and the inefficiency of the tubes, it has become necessary to divert a large quantity of mail formerly dispatched through them to automobiles wherever close connections are required. It has been found that later closings can be made and closer connections assured by means of automobiles. This is true even in the congested sections of New York City.

9. The tubes can not be maintained and operated for the sum mentioned in the amendment—$500,000 per annum. In their report Stone and Webster state that the average cost of operation for the past 4½ years was $512,000 annually, and that the system can be operated by the Government for $453,000 annually. The average cost for the period mentioned is not a proper standard by which to measure present and future cost. Because of war conditions, increased wages, and shorter hours of Government employment, the tubes can not be operated for $500,000 per annum. No provision is made for depreciation or maintenance of the tubes, which are fast deteriorating, and which will have to be rebuilt long before final payment has been made. It will be necessary to ask for a large deficiency appropriation each year to operate and maintain the system.

10. Under the proposed plan of payment the franchises will expire in some cities before the tubes are even paid for. In one instance the property will revert to the city, and the Government will be required by the law to pay for and operate the system after the property has reverted to the city.

11. Because under the proposed plan, assuming that the maximum price of $4,432,622 is paid for the tubes, 11 years will have expired before final payment can be made, thus expending approximately $11,000,000 for which the Government will acquire and be compelled to operate 56 miles of worthless junk, and because of its use delay millions of letters annually.

12. The Government is under no moral obligation to purchase the tubes or continue their use on a rental basis, a fact that is admitted by the tube owners. This is even more apparent when it is known that the department has already paid more than $11,000,000 in rental for the tubes now in use, which is twice the estimated cost of construction.

13. The department would be compelled to purchase and hereafter operate the present obsolete pneumatic-tube system notwithstanding the fact that better means of underground transportation may be obtained. Even at this time the department has under consideration the utilization of subways for the transportation of all mail in the congested portions of the city of New York.

14. The proposed manner of purchase is not as favorable to the Government as that offered by one of the tube companies to the department in 1916, when it was stated that they expected to realize only that degree of value which the tubes possess to the Government service. They did not even ask that they be purchased at their physical value. To this offer the department replied that the tubes had so little utility value to the service that they would not be accepted as a gift.

The Post Office Department, because of war conditions, is conducting the Postal Service under many handicaps. Efficient postal service is of the utmost importance to the public, and its efficiency should not be intentionally impaired by requiring the purchase and further use of these tubes, which, in the opinion of those responsible for the postal service, as statements submitted to the commission show, are archaic, worn-out and useless junk.

At this critical period in the history of our country I think that we should conserve its resources and not expend large sums of money in a useless or wasteful manner at a time when our people are called upon, and will no doubt continue to be called upon, to make great sacrifices. The purchase of these tubes is so strongly protested against by the experts of the Postal Service, by the postmasters and supervisory officials at the offices where the tubes are operated, that I sincerely regret that your commission did not summon those persons before it and hear from them the many sound reasons why the tubes should be abandoned. That their judgment in this respect is sound is confirmed by the fact that the merchants of Boston more than 15 years ago abandoned the use of the 5 miles of tube built by them for underground transportation. The judgment of these officials is further corroborated by the opinion reached by a commission appointed by the Postmaster General of Great Britain which visited this country several years ago to investigate the pneumatic tube systems in use here and which reported to their Government that our tube system was no more efficient than the ordinary road van used on the streets of London.

In conclusion I wish to again earnestly protest against any appropriation being made for the purchase, operation, or rental of the present pneumatic-tube systems and urge that the use of these tubes be abandoned.

May I not ask that this letter be inserted in the RECORD when the item carrying this appropriation is under consideration so that it may be a matter of public record that no person connected with the Postal Service is in any way responsible for unloading this valueless property on the Government, but, on the contrary, that the department and the postal officials consistently opposed such action.

Respectfully,

(Signed) A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] eight minutes.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, with the information obtained by reading the hearings and the information stated on this floor and the information which in the course of several years has been given here session after session concerning the matter of these pneumatic tubes, and therefore with the light which I have before me, I should feel that I was stultifying myself—without in any sense intending by that expression to criticize any other gentleman—if I did not support the proposition embodied in this amendment No. 23, to acquire these tubes. I will state as briefly as may be the reasons why I am impelled to that conclusion. I have sat here for five years asking and insisting on—and being one of those who rejoiced when we succeeded in getting—an annual appropriation of some $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 for the purpose of keeping up and extending the Rural Mail Service. That service reaches a class of people throughout this Nation in whose facilities for receiving mail the men in Chicago, New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, and St. Louis have no particular interest; yet each time the men from those great cities have voted with me and in the interest of my constituents for those rural-mail facilities; and I will not at this time be niggardly with them when with an almost united front, and certainly when supported by all the facts and the logic as adduced in this debate, they ask for this rural-mail facility.

There are 30,000,000 pieces of first-class mail matter each day that go through the pneumatic tubes in those six great cities. The tendency of every city in this land, from the size of my own home city of Houston, Tex., of 150,000 people, up through all the gradations of size to the city of New York, is to get as much traffic and as much of the facilities for human convenience as possible placed below ground.

Franchise after franchise is sought to prevent congestion by putting things below ground. Here in the city of Washington, think what a great delight it is to have the trolleys that carry the street cars run from power below ground instead of on poles above ground? In the city of New York, where I suppose five or six million human beings dwell, where multiplied millions of pieces of first-class mail can be thrown into a pneumatic tube and by the pressure of the air quickly delivered into the post office down at the terminal, it seems to me an unthinkable piece of folly that we should now propose to inaugurate in those crowded streets a jitney service of taxicabs. [Laughter and applause.]

Here is another thing—and I address this to any gentleman like myself, a Representative from a country of rural people with rural mail routes—one-third of the rural mail routes of the United States do not pay expenses, and upon the score of wealth or population or the letters that go through the rural routes, not two-thirds of those routes could be maintained on their merit 24 hours; and yet the $100,000,000 out of $323,000,000 that it takes every year to run the Post Office Department is contributed by the mighty city of New York alone through its drop letter and mail letters of 3 cents to make up this deficit. Now, when that powerful city, industrially and commercially, New York, closely seconded by Chicago, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, and St. Louis, ask in the name of all the people who pay that $100,000,000, that you give them this facility, do not deny it to them, because they pay for the rural routes.

We make in the appropriation bill an appropriation each year of $900,000 to maintain this system of pneumatic mail transmission in these six large cities. Four hundred and fifty thousand dollars of it goes for the service and $450,000 goes for rent to the owners of those pneumatic tubes. This amendment provides the same amount—$900,000—so, by adopting this amendment, it will not cost the people of the Nation one penny more than it will to keep on the arrangement that we have been having for 10 or 15 years. The other $450,000 goes to the acquisition of the property itself, so that in 10 years' time the Postal Department will own absolutely those postal facilities that it is now paying $900,000 a year to use. I can see no logic in gentlemen declining to buy it. Besides, the upset price of $4,400,000 in round numbers provided in this amendment is not to be taken as final price. That is to be left to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Four or five commissions appointed by the Senate and the House have investigated this same matter, and every one of them has decided in favor of this system.

Every Postmaster General's report, except for 1 year, for 16 years has decided in favor of the pneumatic-tube service; and why should it not? They drop a letter down where no human being has to care for it, and it is carried for miles and delivered at the right place. Now, it is seriously proposed to put the Government to the expense and put some gentlemen to the enormous responsibility and task of having to buy a thousand automobiles, hire a thousand drivers, patronize a thousand garages, and buy high-priced gasoline—that is a burden that I do not want to put upon anybody. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] has admirably expressed the reasons which influence my mind on this question. The one issue, it seems to me, is: Shall the mail be carried on the streets or shall it be carried in the tubes? What is the great problem that we face in every large city in America to-day? Why, the one great problem is the congestion of traffic on the streets. That congestion is relieved by pneumatic tubes, and yet the proposition is made here to abandon the service of the last 10 years and adopt a system which, instead of relieving, will increase that congestion. That seems to me turning back the wheels of progress; so that I should think everyone's natural predisposition would be to believe that the tube is the proper and natural method of distribution.

Now, what objection is there to that? The real objection has been the bitter and fanatical opposition of the Postmaster General. I do not know what originated his hostility. I served with him many years in this House, where I became his warm friend and admired his ability; but I do not think that the expedition which has been shown in the transmission of mails since he became Postmaster General—not simply to France but in this country—speaks well for his efficiency as Postmaster General. I think, on the contrary, it shows that he can not qualify as a witness as to what is expeditious and efficient service. [Laughter and applause.]

Much has been said here about there being a lobby. Whether there is a lobby or not I do not know. I have seen no signs of it, but there has been much loose gossip. I read in one of the New York papers this morning charges about a lobby, and it said that Senator WEEKS, a member of the firm of Hornblower & Weeks, had stock in the pneumatic tubes. Senator WEEKS authorized me to say that he had not been a member of the firm since he entered the Senate, and that that firm had not a dollar in pneumatic-tube stock, although some stock stood in their name for clients. But no lobby, no matter how efficient, every Member of the House will admit, could be half so effectual in this House and the other branch as the persistent interest which the Postmaster General has given to the defeat of this project. [Laughter.] So that I do not think that outside influence has been on the side of the pneumatic tube. If we all admit that fundamentally service by pneumatic tube is better than service on the surface of the ground, then it seems to me no proposition could be worked out more fairly than it is in this Senate amendment. I am inclined to agree with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said—that we, as Members of this House, can not go into details. We thought that we could not, and therefore we appointed a commission of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House—men who had the confidence of both branches—and five out of six of that commission, after exhaustive investigation, told us the pneumatic tube was advisable. Therefore we are not obliged to go into details. We have had a high commission of our own choosing, which has given its decision. This amendment, following the recommendation of that commission, does not pretend to fix what price we shall pay, but it says that an impartial body, the Interstate Commerce Commission, shall determine what the price shall be. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that every precaution of fairness, of good judgment, is provided; that there shall be no extravagance, no unfairness. We have appointed a commission in whom we have confidence; and it seems to me, on every ground of common sense and prudence and precedent, we ought to adopt the Senate amendment, amended as it will be to take effect in November instead of July.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a letter of the Postmaster General showing his reasons against this pneumatic-tube service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to renew my objection, but I will ask the gentleman from California whether he will use his best endeavors to get Senator BANKHEAD's answer to that letter and insert it?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the city of St. Louis is one of the cities that has this service at the present time. St. Louis has had this service for a good many years. The citizens of that town have urged repeatedly an extension of this service. It has been so beneficial to the best interests of St. Louis and of the Southwest that they have felt that it would be a great loss to them were the service terminated at this time or at any time. I have failed to find a single citizen of the city of St. Louis who has at any time since I have been a Member of this House—some seven years—appealed to me to vote against the service or even criticized the service. On the other hand, every organization, every business association of that city, the Merchants' Exchange, the Chamber of Commerce, and every industry, have repeatedly appeared before the commissions investigating this matter, earnestly pleading for its continuation as far as St. Louis is concerned, and also that it be extended. A short time ago this commission was in St. Louis and had an extensive hearing. The business interests appeared before it, citizens appeared before it, and every voice raised at that hearing was in favor of it, with one single exception, and that was a very mild one, that being from the postmaster of the city. He himself in years past had been one of the most enthusiastic men for the service, but since he had become postmaster he has changed his opinion in regard to it. That is due largely, I believe, to the attitude of the Postmaster General himself.

The people of the city wanted and they are willing to pay for it, and they have been paying for it out of the proceeds of that office. The post office at St. Louis is one of the most remunerative in the country. Its receipts are a great deal more than its expenses. The people of that city want this service, and the great cities, including St. Louis, are helping the Government. They are doing their part. St. Louis is doing more than its part. She is doing more than she is called upon to do, and we should have this service continued.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, three minutes is a very brief time in which to discuss so important a matter. I have given this matter some thought for the past 20 years, and the discussion that has been had to-day on the floor has displayed the greatest lack of knowledge of the usefulness of this utility of anything that I have ever observed in the House. My colleague and friend, Mr. MADDEN, called attention to the fact and says that he wants a disinterested commission. I suppose he was here and voted for the commission that was appointed, and I assume he believes that they were disinterested. They, being disinterested, recommend this thing by a majority of 5 to 1. In addition to that they do the very thing suggested by my colleague, leave it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a fixed Government utility, and the commission provides that they shall not pay exceeding a certain sum, but shall pay the actual value. So that the very thing that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is asking for is contained in the bill.

As a matter of fact, when gas was discovered in London the candle makers thought it was a very bad thing, and they had a convention and passed a resolution to stop the use of it as an illuminant.

When it was proposed to carry passengers by steam from Philadelphia to New York, a convention of stage drivers resolved that this would be dangerous to human life and would interfere with the business of stage drivers. So with all of the activities of life. Every improvement is held back, and in this particular case the owners of the wagons have been able to embarrass the use of the pneumatic tube, but as soon as the strong hand of the automobile owner came in he has been able to make such an impression that Congress is hesitating as to whether we will go on with this useful service. There never has been a postmaster in the United States who recommended against the use of this until the present Postmaster General came into power, and the reason for that is apparent to every man who knows national politics and policies in this country.

They point to these torn papers down there on the desk as having been recovered from some tube in the city of Chicago. Mr. Speaker, for 20 years we have run the tubes in Chicago. I do not know what has happened lately, but everybody in the United States thanks God every time he gets a piece of mail since this man has been Postmaster General. [Laughter.] He does not understand just why he gets it or how he gets it. But the fault of those torn papers is not the fault of the pneumatic-tube system. The fault is in the management of the Post Office Department, which comes to Congress now and says it is the fault of this system. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am asking the gentlemen of the House to consider this matter from the human side. In the city of New York 22,772 people were injured last year by vehicles and 441 were killed by autmobiles. This year in the first five months 7,653 were injured and 158 were killed and 4,507 injured by automobiles. In January of this year the Postmaster General inaugurated what is called the Government automobile service in the city of New York, and lo and behold, the number of people killed and injured since the Government took it over is greater than before. In addition to that, we have this new form of burden of the Government placed upon the people of New York. The families that have lost the life of a member or that have suffered otherwise in consequence of the negligent operation of Government-owned automobiles can not sue the Government and can not recover a single cent. In many instances they have had to appeal to charitable organizations to take care of their injured. There has been some correspondence going on between the Postmaster General and myself in regard to that condition of affairs, and he suggests that the automobile drivers or chauffeurs be sued, and in that manner they can collect damages from them. The correspondence is as follows:

APRIL 30, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. BURLESON: Since the Government undertook to run its own auto mail trucks in New York City there have been a series of accidents in which pedestrians have been either hurt or killed. The way the law stands now the Government can not be sued in the Court of Claims, and apparently there is no relief for those who have lost members of their families or have been injured under the circumstances described by me.

May I therefore ask you to advise me what the policy of the Post Office Department is in reference to these matters and if there is any suggestion of legislation on your part to remedy the conditions which I have described herein?

Previous to January 1 the contractors were liable, and at the present time if any damage is done to the auto mail trucks the Government can sue the parties causing the damage. On the other hand, when the Government mail trucks damage some one else's property there is no relief either in the Court of Claims or otherwise in existence at the present time. With kindest regards,

Very sincerely, yours, ISAAC SIEGEL.

Hon. ALBERT S. BURLESON,
The Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1918.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SIEGEL: I wish to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, inviting attention to the difficulty experienced in securing relief in those cases where persons are injured as the result of accidents involving the operation of Government-owned trucks engaged in mail transportation, and note your statement that as the law now stands the Government can not be sued in the Court of Claims, and apparently there is no relief for those persons who have lost members of their families or who have been injured under the circumstances related above.

The advisability of securing general legislation that would enable the department to adjust claims for injuries as they might arise has not been brought to the department's attention before, but in view of your representations I shall take pleasure in giving the matter careful consideration.

In this connection I desire to invite your attention to the fact that while the Government can not be held responsible in cases such as suggested in your letter, the person desiring relief would have the right of action against the driver of the Government-owned truck, provided it could be shown that the accident was caused by the carelessness or negligence of the chauffeur.

Very truly, yours, A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

MAY 7, 1918.

Hon. ALBERT S. BURLESON,
The Postmaster General.

MY DEAR MR. BURLESON: Acknowledging receipt of yours of the 4th instant, will state that I am pleased to note that you are going to give careful consideration to the advisability of securing general legislation which would enable the department to adjust claims for injuries caused by the operation of Government-owned trucks engaged in mail transportation.

Let me add that to simply sue the chauffeur of the Government-owned truck means nothing in New York, as not a single one of them has any financial responsibility of any kind or description.

I might suggest that the proper procedure would be that the Government require that these chauffeurs give a bond, so that in case any accidents happen that the person injured may be able to sue on the bond.

You can not realize the recklessness with which these chauffeurs are driving these mail-transportation trucks through the streets of New York. Were you personally to be in New York unannounced and to notice the manner in which they are racing through our streets you would be astounded.

Very sincerely, yours, ISAAC SIEGEL.

WASHINGTON, May 10, 1918.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SIEGEL: Replying to your letter of the 7th instant, addressed to the Postmaster General, in regard to securing general legislation that would enable the department to adjust claims for injuries resulting from accidents involving the operation of Government-owned trucks engaged in mail transportation, I wish to inform you that your suggestion that the Government require chauffeurs to give a bond upon which persons sustaining injuries would be able to bring suit will be given consideration before a decision is reached as to the method that shall be pursued in adjusting claims for damages arising out of accidents in the operation of mail trucks.

Very truly, yours,

J. W. JOHNSTON,
Acting First Assistant Postmaster General.

POLICE DEPARTMENT,
NEW YORK, June 12, 1918.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of June 11 addressed to the police commissioner, and requesting statistics showing the number of people hurt in the city of New York by automobiles, has been received.

In reply the police commissioner directs me to furnish you with the following table of statistics:

	Year 1917.	First 5 months, 1918.
Number of accidents	23,933	8,669
Number of persons killed by autos	441	158
Number of persons killed by other vehicles	250	66
Total persons killed	691	224
Number of persons injured by autos	12,805	4,507
Number of persons injured by other vehicles	9,967	3,146
Total persons injured	22,772	7,653

N. B.—Can not give re mail wagons.

Very truly, yours,

J. C. HACKETT,
Secretary to Department.

I do not know how it may appeal to the Member coming from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], where perhaps the automobile drivers of the Government have not as yet killed some of the citizens and their children. It does not, however, appeal to the people of the big cities of the country, who contribute more than one-half of the money for the running of the postal system of the United States, and especially to the residents of the city of New York, to be told to turn around and sue chauffeurs for having their relatives and next of kin killed or injured. Now, we have heard considerable here about some rubbish which has been produced over there on the table. I have my sincere doubts as to whether that rubbish ever passed through any pneumatic tube in any city of this country. I have seen them operated. There are several up in my part of town. The post-office stations are up there, and I have never seen rubbish of that kind around the post offices of New York except when it was gathered together from the floors to be thrown out. I think I have visited the large post offices and the foreign branches perhaps as often as any other man has done, because in my congressional district, small in area but not in numbers—it is only a mile long and half a mile wide—we know the conditions on the streets, and the people of that city appeal to the Members of this House telling them that we have willingly given not only in money but in human life for the running of this war all that can be asked of us, and in return we ask the retention of this pneumatic system. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat referred to the fact that no postmasters in this country were ever opposed to the pneumatic-tube system until the present Postmaster General assumed office. In corroboration of that statement I wish to refer to the case of the postmaster at Boston. When he was a Member of this House, representing a Boston constituency, he was in favor of the continuance of the pneumatic-tube service. Moreover, he was in favor of the pneumatic-tube service when he became postmaster of Boston, and he so told the business men of that city. Furthermore, when I was making a fight for better postal service for the city of Cambridge, which is just across the river from Boston and where the service was wretched and was constantly getting worse and the separation of Cambridge from the Boston postal district was advocated as a remedy, Mr. Murray, the postmaster of Boston, wrote a letter to the mayor of Cambridge, in which he opposed the establishment of a separate post office for Cambridge and suggested as his remedy for the existing situation in Cambridge the extension of the pneumatic-tube system to that city. Yet, in spite of the fact of that letter to the mayor of Cambridge, at the command of the Postmaster General the postmaster of Boston turned around and came out and said that the tubes were useless and worthless and that the system should be abandoned. That is the kind of pressure that the Postmaster General is exerting to defeat this facility, the usefulness and necessity of which have been repeatedly demonstrated and the retention and extension of which are asked for by the people of the large cities of this country, who pay almost one-half of the entire postal revenue.

Mr. Speaker, my city is united for the retention and extension of the pneumatic-tube system, and the people of New York City are unanimously in favor of the retention of the pneumatic-tube system and an extension of that system to The Bronx.

As the Representative of an important part of the metropolitan district of Boston, I appeal to the Members representing the rural districts in this House to give to us, who have always been ready and willing to give you rural free delivery—given at a loss to the Government—what we ask and what experience has demonstrated to be necessary for the continuance of quick and certain postal service in the large centers of population. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he proposes to close debate in one speech.

Mr. MOON. I think there is only one speech to use up all of the remaining time.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has only one minute remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I must have two. Will the gentleman from Tennessee give me a minute more?

Mr. MOON. No; the gentleman has had too much now to talk about a thing like this. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee half promised to give another minute to this side, but if he does not want to do it we will do the best we can with the minute remaining.

Mr. MOON. I did not promise the gentleman a minute, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman came over here in very good humor, the best humor I have seen him in for a long time——

Mr. MOON. I am always in a good humor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And indicated that he might give——

Mr. MOON. I will give the gentleman time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much?

Mr. MOON. I will give the gentleman half a minute; that is all. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is quite generous. He is making good the half a minute he has consumed. Gentlemen, the pneumatic-tube service is justified by law; let us get that clear in our minds. There is no attempted robbery here, such as gentlemen seem to indicate, but rather a confiscation of private property by the Government.

The use of the pneumatic tubes has been steadily authorized by law. It began in 1893, sanctioned by act of Congress, and from that year down to the present time has been approved and operated by the various Post Office Department administrations except the present one. It was regularly accepted by the Government and approved, with recommendations for increased appropriations to extend the service, because the business men of the country regarded it as an efficient service and demanded its continuance.

The members of the Philadelphia delegation are unanimous in their desire to have this service continued. They speak not for the tube companies but for the business interests of the city, for the trade and commercial bodies and the manufacturing interests, and all those in other sections of the country with whom they have to deal. The unobstructed facility with which the mails can be started clear out to Utah, if the Chair pleases, or out of the congested centers all the way down to Texas, is what actuates the business men in their desire to have this service sustained. In the great cities we seek to avoid the delays incident to street congestion. Gentlemen from outlying districts should appreciate our difficulty. We must go overhead or underground. We should not be forced to return to motors and vehicles on the surface. It is too dangerous, too slow, and too provincial. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-seven gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 23 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether, in the state my voice is in, I can be heard very far, but I hope that in the time I shall attempt to address the House to be able to show that it is wrong to agree to Senate amendment 23, to purchase the tubes, and I hope that I may have your patient attention.

The great cities involved in this controversy furnish an immense amount of revenue to the Government. It is not the desire of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads or the majority of the conferees on this bill on the part of the House to deprive those cities of any benefits that they have. They now have in New York nine deliveries in the business part of the city and seven in the residential part. We propose to give them the same, but quicker and better service. But that is not the question. They are entitled to these benefits, and we are proposing to give them to them, and if we can give a better service for half a million dollars less per annum, is it not due to the National Treasury that it shall be done?

I make this suggestion, however, apart from the discussion of the question involved, and I want to say that while I intend to speak candidly for a few moments and say some things that I believe ought to be said, I am not calling into question either the integrity or the good motives of any man in this House or out of it in reference to this question.

Now, I insist that as an economic proposition, as a legal proposition, as a moral proposition, this House can not afford to stand for the Senate amendment to purchase these tubes. First, what are the tubes? They are the conduits by which mail is carried from the station to the post office or from station to station in these cities. These tubes are owned exclusively and operated by private corporations, not by the Government. The Government pays $536,000 a year for this service. Is it the best service? Who knows? The inexperienced who testified, the men whose testimony is hearsay, the men whose testimony is purely negative in its character, or those whose knowledge is technical and expert and the result of actual experience? When we weigh testimony we must weigh it for the purpose of ascertaining the truth. It follows that no one except the experts upon these questions and the officials of the Government and those who handle these tubes would know; and all of this extraneous testimony, this expression of a desire to continue the tubes, amounts to nothing when you come to consider a great public question involving the expenditure of money. These tubes were in use for some years, and upon a report made to this House showing the enormous per cent of profit that was made by the owners the House 10 or 11 years ago abandoned the whole tube system. Then another law was enacted, a better law, the present law. But the taint of fraud connected with the original transaction was such that the House placed in the law a provision that at the expiration of that lease, unless five expert postal officials should recommend their continuance, they should be abandoned. The end of the lease came, the expert officials were appointed, they took the testimony of the officials in the cities where the tubes were operated, and the unanimous report was that they should be abandoned.

Then came this proposition to continue them pending an investigation by Senators and Representatives, who know nothing about the expert matters connected with this service. Their report, the third attempt made by these two companies to foist the tubes upon the Government, is made, and the majority report is in favor of it. Now, I venture to state that any intelligent man who will look over the testimony will find, first, that from all the competent testimony it is clearly established that the tubes are old and worn, that the day of their service is nearly past, that the Government of the United States can carry this mail overland at 30 to 40 per cent less than they can carry it by the tubes underground, that they can carry it overland at every office in the United States where the tubes are used in from 2 to 32 minutes less time than it can be carried by the tubes. That is the weight of the proof. Take the testimony of the postmasters in most of these cities, two excepted, and that is their testimony. That is the testimony of the officials, that is the testimony of the experts. Then it is established that the service is better overland, that the service is quicker overland, and that it is cheaper overland. Why, this very report recommending the purchase, this report made by these gentlemen, admits upon its face in express terms that you can carry this mail daily for $312 less overland than you can by these tubes. That ought to settle that question.

The truth is, gentlemen, when you get down to the bottom facts, you can carry this mail for thirty-odd per cent less per annum than the tubes carry it. And what part of the mail do they carry? To hear this argument you would think that they carry a great portion of the mail. They do not. They carry less than 12 per cent of the mail. If these cities must have tubes, if that is the best service which they can have, they ought to have a tube that will carry the mail, not the old 8-inch commercial tube, along the line of which there must be four or five rests in order to get the mail to the office, tubes that destroy mail frequently, as these do. Gentlemen, this is nothing on earth but a bold and daring attempt of these private corporations to foist their rotten and worthless junk upon the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

I have this to assert, too, as a matter of law: That these tube companies that propose to sell the tubes to you, while they own the patents, while they own the iron that goes under the ground and the conduits and the containers, they do not own, and as a matter of law can not own, a single foot of the right of way over which they pass. [Applause.] The Government can not get any better title than the tube companies have. What title have they? They have contracts with the cities to lay the mains that carry on the purposes of their private corporations. And mark the distinction. Private corporations are for private gain. They have no public function to perform. Public corporations, like municipalities or cities, are clothed with a part of the sovereignty of the Commonwealth that gives them existence. They have the right to confer powers upon semi or quasi public corporations, like street-car lines, or water mains, and telephone and telegraph companies. But I submit to you as a proposition of law that has not been controverted since men wrote legal decisions, that no board of aldermen, no legislature, and not the Congress itself has the power when a public street is once laid out and consigned to a municipality as trustees, to be operated in the interest of the people—that that municipality is absolutely without power to give any right on such a public street to a purely private corporation, and that is what has been done in this instance. A contract to give the right of way or a license for a number of years to a private company over a public street is strictly ultra vires, and confers no right on anyone but is absolutely void. That proposition is not true as to quasi public corporations, but it is true as to strictly private corporations; and the concession is made here in this report, and if it were not made in the report the terms of the charter show that this American Pneumatic Tube Company is only a private corporation. In most cities the municipality owns the fee of all the streets and holds it as trustee for the public use and benefit and can not divest itself of the trust. If the abutting-property owner owned to the center of the street, the city would be powerless under the Constitution to rest any servitude on the street other than that permitted in the Constitution and laws. You may take private property for public use upon compensation, but you can not take public property for private use under the Federal Constitution with or without compensation. Why? Because the Federal Government is one of limited powers, and no such power is delegated. The States have an inhibition upon the exercise of such power, and if not it would be void as against public policy. The board of aldermen, who as trustees exercise partial State sovereignty for the use and benefit of the people of the city, have gone beyond their power in every one of these instances, and have conferred no right. The Government, if it purchased, would have to take as a proprietor, and it would acquire no higher right than its vendor, the tube company, and could get us no better title than the company had. The company is only in legal effect a naked trespasser on the streets.

It is true the Government of the United States can exercise its paramount sovereignty and provide for the transmission of its mails in any way Congress may determine and can pass a law condemning the right of way to make safe and secure the transmission of mails. But these people could not sell a right they have not.

Now, I am not going into any extensive discussion of the reasons for every one of these propositions, but I will give up my contention if you can find a single authority in the United States courts or the State courts, or in the text books, that does not announce squarely the proposition that a municipality has no power and can acquire no power to give a private corporation a right to the use of a public street permanently, or fix upon it a permanent servitude for the benefit of a private corporation. So you know they have nothing to sell. They are only attempting to get money from the Government for nothing, and that is all there is in it. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Well, if it is necessary, I can pay my respects to some gentlemen very well in that time.

I have spoken to you briefly as to the economic and legal features of the question involved. It does seem to me that if you take this worn-out material at two prices that you are making a very foolish trade for the Government. The suggestion that the Interstate Commerce Commission dispose of the matter is one that could not be too strongly condemned from a business point of view, inasmuch as you practically fix the upset price of the tubes and then indicate legislatively to the Interstate Commerce Commission that this is the figure it ought to give. You buy them in advance and expect the price possibly to be cut down later by the action of an independent body, and yet you intimate that you think the price of $4,442,000 is about right. That is just about three times the value of the tubes.

I have no purpose whatever of reflecting upon the integrity or the motives of any Member of this House, nor their good faith in this transaction, but I have a very poor opinion of what many of you think as to the interests of the Government in this matter.

I am going to speak of the matter in another light. There is a great lobby here unquestionably in the interest of the passage of this measure. It can be seen everywhere. I do not know that anybody has corruptly received any money in connection with the matter, but the suggestion I desire to make is this, that while large amounts of money are being used to force legislation through Congress, it is evident that some good benefit is to come to those who are expending the money.

Now, let us look at some of the circumstances connected with this transaction, but before doing so I want to express my surprise at the advocacy of this tube matter by certain gentlemen who appeared upon the floor in its behalf. It was almost inconceivable to me that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] could have aligned himself upon that side of the fight. Nobody questions his motives or his honesty, but he was not able to give a single substantial reason for his position, in my judgment.

Our good old friend, Mr. MASON, from Illinois, whose integrity nobody questions, is on that side of the question; but I find reason for his position in the following telegram, dated Chicago, Ill., October 1, 1915:

Hon. A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your telegram of the 30th to Senator LEWIS, I represent Mr. Mulholland, and thank you for extending hearing to the 10th.
WILLIAM E. MASON.

Mr. Mulholland referred to is the owner of the pneumatic tubes in Philadelphia. [Laughter and applause.] I am not now saying that the gentleman from Illinois is counsel now for Mr. Mulholland, or that he did anything wrong or would do anything wrong now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois was not a member of the House at that time.

Mr. MOON. I do not care whether he was or not, he is now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is fair to say that he was not.

Mr. MOON. I did not yield to the gentleman. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not say this to affect the gentleman from Illinois; but I do say that if a man two years ago was counsel for one of these tube companies then, though he is not now, his sympathies would be along the lines of the position he once occupied as counsel. I am not going to charge Mr. MASON or anyone at all in connection with this matter with anything wrong, though I might doubt the propriety of the gentleman supporting the measure under the circumstances.

It has been said that $400,000 was set aside by the tube companies to force this measure through Congress. I do not know whether that is true or not. I do know that if they wanted to get an upset price of $4,442,000 they could readily afford to pay $1,000,000 for lobbying the measure through. They are asking this price for the tubes now. The largest one of these tubes, I am informed, could have been bought recently for less than $600,000. I have this statement in the paper lying before me. A Chicago paper now upon my table gives an account of the great lobby here seeking to press through this nefarious proposition against the interest of the Public Treasury.

I am going to make some inquiries of you, and ask you if you know about certain facts said to exist, and if you do not I am going to advise you that probably if you will call on the Postmaster General he can enlighten you on the subject. How many lawyers are engaged as counsel for these tube companies? How many are quartered in Washington? What legal questions are now under consideration that need this array of counsel? Be not mistaken. It is not legal counsel—it is gentlemen with political influence that they need.

Why do they send 1,500 miles and bring here an ex-Member of the House if it is not for political rather than legal influence? If a lawyer were needed, just as good or better ones could be obtained in Washington, Philadelphia, or New York. One of these distinguished lawyers signed his name as of counsel for the American Pneumatic Tube Co. He ought to have said "of the lobby of the pneumatic tube company." We would understand his attitude better. This gentleman, as many others, has written letters to you urging the acceptance of the tube proposition. Why, I have no doubt that the transaction between the counsel and the tube companies is altogether legitimate from a strictly legal standpoint if they had wanted a lawyer; but why should they go 1,500 miles to Texas and bring back an ex-Representative of Congress to represent them in legal matters, particularly when such Representative never distinguished himself greatly for legal ability when here? [Laughter and applause.] It means, gentlemen, this, if nothing more, that somebody has got money to pay for putting this proposition through Congress and that it is being used. Who else comes here as of counsel for the tube companies? They want counsel, not merely a member of the bar, but they are very anxious for counsel from the newspaper fraternity. I have lying before me a statement to the effect that certain newspaper writers for great metropolitan papers are employed by the tube companies to assist them in forcing the sale of the tubes to the Government; that their expenses are paid in Washington during the winter and that they live in cottages by the sea in the summer months on the bounty of the tube companies. I do not know whether it is so or not, but I believe if you will go to the Post Office Department you will find some names and facts there that would justify you in the conclusion that it is true. It is from that source my information came.

Again, what do you think of this? The President of the United States is said to have received a telegram from the mayor of the city of Boston advising adoption of the Senate amendment No. 23, and when he replied to the mayor the mayor said that he had never sent such a telegram to him. Who do you reckon forged the name of the city mayor to the telegram to the President? I can see no motive on the part of anyone except the owners of the pneumatic tubes or persons acting for them—a circumstance that you might look to in determining the good faith of this proposed transaction. If you want any proof upon that subject you can get it where I did—at the Post Office Department. Have you seen gentlemen sitting in the gallery looking down upon you on a previous occasion when telegrams were rained in upon this floor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. No; I do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I am making a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point of order is that the gentleman is making charges——

Mr. MOON. I am not making a charge at all. I am asking you to make inquiries in reference to these matters.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is asking to insert in the RECORD certain documents, and he is now referring to charges and inviting the Members of the House to read these documents in the RECORD without stating their contents.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Tennessee has done nothing of the sort.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That the gentleman can not insert those documents in the RECORD without the consent of the House.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has not asked the consent of the House, and does not want to insert them.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the point of order.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman knew that when he made it. I will ask the gentleman to sit still until I tell him about the Philadelphia Bourse, if I conclude to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a little argument on that question?

Mr. MOON. No. How could I argue with a man whose whole soul is wrapped up in a continuation of the contract or purchase? [Applause and laughter.] There is no argument about it when fraud stalks abroad——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's statements be taken down. I may not have heard the gentleman correctly.

Mr. MOON. There is no fraud charged in reference to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The voice of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in good condition to-day, although he states that he is in good humor. The gentleman made some reference to fraud.

Mr. MOON. None to the gentleman, however.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I accept the gentleman's apology.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to talk about fraud.

Mr. MOON. You need not accept it as an apology. If I had the proof of fraud on the gentleman I would tell him about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am frank enough to believe the gentleman would, and therefore he fails to produce any.

Mr. MOON. But I tell you one thing, I want you to keep away from that bourse, or you may be liable to such a charge.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has no knowledge of any bourse, and the gentleman ought not to make such an insinuation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOON. I am sorry that I have not had the time to submit some very edifying testimony on this subject, but it is perhaps just as well not to do so, and I shall conclude.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes, in which to conclude his address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I object.

Mr. MOON. Oh, it is too late; I already have the time and am using it. [Laughter.] I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I do not know that I want to go any further in these matters. I wanted to refer to the matter of the gentleman in the gallery, ow hom I was speaking when I was shut off by the interruption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That man said that it was with the greatest delight that he looked down upon this House and saw the Members responding to the telegrams from their constituents which he had inspired, and how quickly they turned over and voted with him upon the tube question. He said he was delighted. Why, Mr. Speaker, strange to say, that man now is a major in the United States Army. They call him Maj. Hicks. For particulars see Post Office Department, where you can find out much other matter of interest on the tubes. These people have gone into the profession of the law, into the medical profession; they have gone into the Army and Navy; they have gone into the newspaper world; they have gone to the farms, and are bold enough to go into the ministry to help them in this undertaking. You have heard all of the facts. It is unnecessary for me to further relate them. You know the badges of fraud when you see them. You know the slime of the serpent as he trails through these transactions; you know he is coiled, ready to pour his venom and corruption into you if the opportunity is afforded.

Shall we deal with this question with simple justice and honor? Shall we, without power to name a single fact on circumstance that justifies it, vote this money out of the Public Treasury for private corporations? Is there a business condition that would justify it? Name a legal condition that would justify it. In view of the vast amount of money being used, whether legal or not, to put through this deal, I ask you, from the highest point of public morals, to name a single moral principle upon which you can justify a vote in behalf of the Senate amendment No. 23. If they have no title to the right of way, if the tubes are worn out, if they are proposing to sell them at three times their cost, if the overland service is better and quicker—and everything in this record conspires to show that to be true—then how will you justify your vote for this proposition? Are you going to allow it to resolve itself into the simple question of favoring a private corporation against the National Treasury? I am not prepared to say that every act in connection with the pneumatic-tube transaction from its inception to date is larcenous in all of its details, but it is sinister in every essential. We should further insist upon our disagreement to the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to make a motion?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 23.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment 23.

Mr. MOON. And on that I move the previous question.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the preferential motion that the House concur in the Senate amendment 23 with an amendment, page 16, line 3, striking out the word "July" and inserting "November."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MOON. I move the previous question on the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON moves to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, page 16, line 3, strike out the word "July" and insert "November."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the preferential motion made by the gentleman from Minnesota who moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment 23 and agree to the same with an amendment amending it by striking out the word "July" and inserting the word "November."

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to recede and concur.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Division, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ALEXANDER. For a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is the question on concurring in the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out "July" and inserting "November"?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 181, answered "present" 7, not voting 103, as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 14, 1918.

Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, we thank Thee that once more Thou hast called us to enter into Thy presence, to recognize that Thou art the supreme Ruler of the universe, and to receive from Thee that aid and strength which will enable us to do this day that which will bring glory and honor to Thee and advance the interests of our Nation and the welfare of humanity. To this end wilt Thou guide and watch over the affairs of the Senate and of the House and of the officials of our Government? Wilt Thou be with our Nation as this day they recall the gift of the flag? We thank Thee for what the flag has been in the history of our country. We thank Thee for the eternal principles it symbolizes which Thou hast given to us and through us to men. As Thou hast been with the men who followed that flag in every war in the past, so be with those who follow it now, and grant we may recognize when the end shall come and victory shall once more be given unto us that Thou art the Source of our strength and success, and may we serve Thee hereafter forever faithfully as a people. We ask it in the name of Our Lord and for His glory. Amen.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] is detained by death in his family.

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is detained by illness.

Mr. POMERENE. The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, June 10, 1918, when, on request of Mr. OWEN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the 5th day of October, 1917, just after the present occupant of the chair had vacated the chair, the Senate passed a resolution reading in part as follows:

Senate resolution 77.

Resolved, That only a brief statement of the contents, as provided for in Rule VII, paragraph 5, of such communications as are presented under the order of business "Presentation of petitions and memorials," shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and that no other portion of such communications shall be inserted in the RECORD unless specifically so ordered by vote of the Senate, as provided for in Rule XXIX, paragraph 1.

This rule was not pasted in the volume used by the present occupant of the chair, and my attention was not called to it until through the remarks of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] a few days since.

It is a little difficult to construe this rule with reference to Rule XXIX, which, omitting certain portions of it, may for the purposes of this statement be summarized as follows: Every motion to print memorials and petitions shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The Chair is inclined to make this statement: After mature consideration of the two rules the Chair believes that this is the way the rules should be construed and will be construed, unless there shall be an appeal and the Chair be reversed by the Senate, namely, that when petitions and memorials are presented, except those which come from legislatures or conventions lawfully called by a State, it will be the duty of the Reporter to only include in the RECORD a brief statement of the contents of the petition or memorial, and if a request is made to print any petition or memorial it will be the duty of the Chair to at once submit the question to the Senate for a vote as to whether the petition or memorial shall or shall not be printed in the RECORD.

This now, of course, is a moot decision, and it is not binding, but it will be made if the time comes to make it, and an appeal can be taken from it at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume when the Chair very properly suggests that when a request is made to print the entire petition it shall be submitted to the Senate, unanimous consent would cover that matter, and it will be done if there be no objection, if the Chair puts it in that form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is what the Chair intended to say: That if a request is made to print in full, and there be no objection, it will be printed. If there be an objection——

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be submitted to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be submitted to the Senate for a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is entirely fair.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Did I understand the Chair to say that under the rule if I or any other Member should object to the publication of a petition my objection would force a vote? Does it not follow under that rule that the Reporter will be bound to do what the rule says, and that is only print what the rule says may be printed in the RECORD on its presentation? If whoever presents a petition wants to have it printed, of course he must make the affirmative motion "I move that it be printed in the RECORD." That will bring the matter to the attention of those interested and give the Senate an opportunity to act. Otherwise the rule would be absolutely ineffective unless some one objected to it. I did not hear the Chair distinctly, and therefore I can not be criticizing what the Chair said or take exceptions to anything except what I barely understood. I think in the execution of the rule it becomes the duty of the Reporter, as the Chair stated in the opening, to print only in the RECORD on the presentation of a memorial or petition what the rule says shall be printed. If I rise to——

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the view of the Chair, that when petitions or memorials not coming from legislatures or lawfully called conventions of States are presented pro forma by a Senator it is the duty of the Reporter to simply insert a brief statement of the contents of the petition or memorial, but if a Senator asks to have it printed in full certainly unanimous consent is as valuable as a vote.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But can the Chair under the rule properly entertain a request for unanimous consent that the rule shall be abrogated, which is tantamount to saying that there is no rule at all about it? A motion to print should accompany the presentation if the applicant wishes to have it printed.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator mean to say that this resolution is the equivalent of a rule?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unquestionably it is a rule.

Mr. GRONNA. The resolution was passed by this body. I agree with the construction placed upon it by the Chair, that we must obtain the permission of the Senate to print, but the Senator can not say that this is made a part of the rules of the Senate. The Senate has never had an opportunity to vote upon it as a rule.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You are giving no one any chance to have a vote on it by unanimous consent, when with only seven Senators present unanimous consent is granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the present view of the Chair. It may be entirely wrong. When unanimous consent is asked to print it will be tantamount to a unanimous vote of the Senate, if no one objects.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then it is tantamount also to saying that whenever a Senator asks unanimous consent the same old rule shall go on, notwithstanding the feeling or the purpose of the committee who reported that provision, which was to relieve from that committee or any member of it the very unpleasant burden of having his friends raising objection to a thing that he had to do under the direction of the rule and under the request of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would not have the slightest doubt about the view of the Senator from Arizona if it were not for construing it in connection with Rule XXIX.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not Rule XXIX before me. I had it in the form of a resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it will take some time for the Senator to study the tentative ruling of the Chair in connection with the resolution and Rule XXIX, paragraph 1, and I suggest to the Senator that it go over for future consideration. However, I wish simply to repeat that the Senator from Arizona said that it was the object of the Committee on Printing to have the Senate take affirmative action before a petition could be printed in full in the RECORD. In other words, a resolution——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, the affirmative action of the Senate does not mean unanimous consent suggested on one side; it means the action of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. But I think that——

The VICE PRESIDENT. I do not see how there could be anything more affirmative than the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think that the Chair is right in his construction of the resolution in connection with——

The VICE PRESIDENT. With Rule XXIX.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with Rule XXIX. I think the decision of the Chair is right, but yet I want to say that was not the intention of the committee in asking the Senate to adopt Senate resolution 77, which was agreed to October 5, 1917.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do I understand that memorials and resolutions in the nature of memorials are now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk three resolutions adopted at a mass meeting at Bristol, Va. and Tenn. They are very short, and in accordance with the ruling of the Chair I ask unanimous consent that they may be extended at length in the RECORD. I have been requested by the people of that city when these resolutions were passed to have them printed in the RECORD. The subject matter of the resolutions is the question of equal suffrage. The meeting was held under the auspices of the National Woman's Party on June 7, 1918, and it expressed itself strongly in favor of the national suffrage amendment now pending before the Senate and asked for an early vote on the amendment. I think those who adopted the resolutions are entitled to have them printed in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent at this time that they be printed in the RECORD in full, and especially as they are very short.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, are the resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. They are not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then I object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I move, under the ruling of the Chair, that the resolutions be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH];

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] the yeas are 14, and the nays are 34. The motion is rejected, and therefore only a brief statement of the contents of the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions referred to were adopted at a public meeting under the auspices of the National Woman's Party in the city of Bristol, Tenn. and Va., on June 7, 1918.

The resolutions recited the work of the women in the war; the fact that they had no voice in the Government; a request to the President to press the national suffrage amendment for passage and that the resolutions be sent to the President, and to Senators MARTIN, GALLINGER, JONES of New Mexico, SWANSON, SHIELDS, and McKELLAR, with the request that said resolutions be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which I have been requested to present to the Senate. It has, however, been mislaid, as there have been only recesses of the Senate for the past two days and consequently no morning hour. I am afraid I may be considered derelict in not having sooner presented the resolution to the Senate. I had it on my desk, and I do not want it to go forth that a resolution of the Legislature of Arizona, which the rule to which reference has been made provides shall be printed in the RECORD, has not been presented and so printed. I ask unanimous consent that when I find the resolution, which is in favor of the adoption of the woman-suffrage constitutional amendment, which the legislature desires to have presented to the Senate of the United States, I may file it at the Secretary's desk for printing in the RECORD, without waiting for another morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona subsequently presented the resolution referred to, which is as follows:

Senate joint memorial 1, by Senator Fred T. Colter; adopted May 25, 1918.

To the Senate of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Third Legislature of the State of Arizona, in special session convened, respectfully represents—

That this Legislature for the State of Arizona is now ready and anxious to adopt the woman's suffrage amendment to the Constitution of the United States;

That Arizona believes its position on this question wise because it has found woman suffrage an unqualified success, and believes it finds evidence to this effect in the almost unequaled record it has made in all branches of our war activities;

That the cause of democracy will be immeasurably advanced when democracy's greatest exponent again declares its faith and grants to its enlightened and ennobled womanhood full opportunity of its citizenship:

Therefore, we beseech you, submit the woman-suffrage amendment and let America speak again.

That certified copies of this joint resolution be forwarded to the governor of this State, to the Secretary of State at Washington, to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I present two resolutions, one adopted at a mass meeting of citizens at Louisville, Ky., and the other adopted at a mass meeting of citizens at Frankfort, Ky., in favor of the pending constitutional amendment granting equal suffrage to women. I have been requested in each instance to have the resolution printed in the RECORD, but in the light of the recent vote I feel that it can not be done. However, under the rule, I understand that a brief statement of each resolution may be placed in the RECORD. If such is the case, I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Louisville, Ky., and resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens at Frankfort, Ky., favoring the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I present a number of resolutions in favor of the woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution. They include a resolution adopted at a joint meeting of the Lynchburg Equal Suffrage League and the Randolph-Macon Woman's College League of Virginia, a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Journeymen Tailors' Union at Norfolk, Va., a resolution adopted by the Twentieth Century Club at Norfolk, Va., and a resolution adopted at the meeting of the Virginia Branch of the National Woman's Party held at Richmond, Va. I send these resolutions to the desk and ask that they may be properly referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of sundry citizens of North Dakota, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Deering, N. Dak., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Equal Suffrage Club, of Winchester, Mass., praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of sundry druggists of Ottawa County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the organization of a pharmaceutical corps in the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for an increase in the salaries of Federal judges, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for a centralized Federal authority to determine and administer the highway policy of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sington, Pa., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of East Hampton, Conn., praying for national prohibition and for the immediate submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Garden Club of Salisbury, Conn., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a resolution of the Placer County Liberty League, of Auburn, Cal., relative to the treatment of American prisoners by Germany and Austria, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, at a meeting of the Agricultural Committee this morning the bill (H. R. 11945) from the House of Representatives containing the so-called Randall amendment was ordered to be reported to the Senate with the Randall amendment stricken out and the so-called Jones amendment inserted. I wish to inquire whether the report has been formally made to the Senate by the acting chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state to the Senator that, after the meeting was over, I was informed by quite a number of the members of the committee that they had mistaken the time at which the meeting was to be held, and, as there was not really a quorum present when the action referred to by the Senator from Nebraska was taken, although we operated under the old rule and decided to report the bill out in the absence of the suggestion of the lack of a quorum, Senators who were absent suggested that, inasmuch as the matter was of such importance, they desired to be heard. So the acting chairman of the committee called another meeting for 3 o'clock this afternoon, at which meeting he has a promise of a full membership being present.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember very distinctly that this morning the clerk of the committee stated that he had notified every Senator who was a member of the committee, and he gave the names of one or two who were absent from the city.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to say to the Senator that the clerk stated that he had notified their offices; but later I understood that some of the Senators thought the meeting was to be held at 10.30 and others thought it was to be held at 11 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee was in session until after that time. I presume the object of the meeting this afternoon, then, is to reconsider the action taken?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; the object of the meeting is simply to give a majority of the committee an opportunity to express their views.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to have the assurance of the acting chairman that there will be no attempt to reconsider the action of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to assure the Senator from Nebraska that no attempt will be made to reconsider anything, but to consider the bill, and whatever action a majority of the committee sees fit to take will be reported by the acting chairman when so instructed by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that, and I am not finding fault at all with that; but I understood the chairman to say that the meeting was to be called only for the purpose of discussing the bill. As a matter of fact, the acting chairman was instructed at the meeting held this morning to report the bill to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true; but knowing that the question might be raised that there was not a majority of the members of the committee present, and inasmuch as Senators who were not present at the meeting afterwards came and insisted that they be heard there was nothing left for me, as acting chairman of the committee, to do but to call a meeting for a later hour, which I have done.

PARITY OF THE AMERICAN DOLLAR ABROAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The communication is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, June 12, 1918.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate of the United States on the 13th day of May, 1918, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for certain information, the following is respectfully submitted:

I. Agreements have been made with certain neutral countries in Europe and with countries in South America and elsewhere involving financial considerations and tending to protect the value of the American dollar. Agreements involving like considerations are in process of negotiation in other countries and in certain neutral countries steps have been taken to provide for payments required therein preliminary to the institution of negotiations. The amount of balances of neutral nations held by banks, trust companies, and bankers in the United States can probably be ascertained and stated with approximate accuracy as of about May 13, 1918. However, I am directed by the President to say that, in his judgment, it would be incompatible with the public interest to make a public record at this time of the terms of such agreements already made or in process of negotiation, or of the other steps that have been taken or are in contemplation to protect the value of the American dollar, or of the amount of balances of neutral countries in the United States, because chiefly of the very great value such information would be to the enemy.

II. I have given directions to have compiled, so far as the Federal authority can be exercised and the same can be made available, figures to show the amount severally of commercial and financial bills payable in terms of the currency of the neutral nations of Europe which have been bought and sold severally by the member banks of the Federal Reserve System and other banks and banking houses dealing in foreign exchange in the city of New York from January 1 to April 1, 1918, and the amount of profit in such transactions. It will take some time to compile this data, but as soon as it is obtained I shall furnish it. I am not at present able to state just how completely or accurately this information can be obtained.

Respectfully submitted. W. G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 70, authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue to James Buchanan, a former President of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I object to unanimous consent, Mr. President, and I will give my reasons later.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 70; and, in connection with that, I wish to say to the Senate that this joint resolution——

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that on the motion to take up the joint resolution no debate is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable before 2 o'clock. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a record vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Kenyon	Norris	Smoot
Baird	King	Nugent	Sterling
Bankhead	Kirby	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Knox	Owen	Thomas
Culberson	Lenroot	Page	Thompson
Curtis	Lodge	Ransdell	Tillman
France	McCumber	Sheppard	Trammell
Gallinger	McKellar	Shields	Underwood

Guion	Martin	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Kendrick	New	Smith, S. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 70. Upon that motion the Senator from Massachusetts requests the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 70) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to submit a few observations, and I hope the Senate will have patience with me while I submit them.

Mr. President, the late Mrs. Harriet Lane Johnston, of Baltimore, by her will created a fund that now amounts to about $100,000, available for the erection in Washington, upon a suitable site designated by Congress, of a memorial to her uncle, James Buchanan, the fifteenth President of the United States.

This provision in Mrs. Johnston's will, if not accepted by Congress on or before July 1, 1918, will lapse, hence the necessity for prompt and favorable action by this body on House joint resolution 70, passed by the House of Representatives on February 21, 1918, designating a site for the Buchanan memorial. I will say, in this connection, that this joint resolution has passed the House twice.

I shall read the following letter sent me by Gen. Lawrason Riggs, of Baltimore, surviving trustee, under Mrs. Johnston's will, because Gen. Riggs very clearly and concisely states the facts and tells the history of this fund. Gen. Riggs writes:

MY DEAR SENATOR SMITH: As sole surviving trustee of a fund created under the will of the late Mrs. Harriet Lane Johnston, of Baltimore, I hold the sum of $100,000 for the erection of a memorial in Washington to President James Buchanan, who was the uncle of Mrs. Johnston. For more than two years I have been in close and friendly cooperation in this matter with the Commission of Fine Arts.

The Commission of Fine Arts, after careful consideration of the matter, suggested the southern end of Meridian Hill Park as a suitable site for this memorial.

A plan and design was prepared for the memorial by two young Baltimoreans, Mr. Hans Schuler, sculptor, and Mr. William Gordon Beacher, architect. This design had considerable study by the commission, meeting its hearty approval and it was formally approved by the commission.

On January 31, 1916, Senator Blair Lee, at the suggestion of some persons in Washington interested in the development of Meridian Hill Park, volunteered to me to introduce into the Senate of the United States a joint resolution authorizing the erection of this memorial as above set forth. The resolution is known as Senate joint resolution 93 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. Later, at the same session of Congress, Mr. LINTHICUM introduced a similar resolution in the House. The House promptly passed the resolution as introduced, but in the Senate the Committee on the Library, misunderstanding the situation, and thinking that the resolution deprived the Commission of Fine Arts of the right of selecting a site, amended the resolution by striking out the definite location named therein. This was unfortunate and the result of a failure on the part of Senator Lee to advise the Committee on the Library that the site named in the resolution was the site selected by the Commission of Fine Arts, and specifically named at the request of the commission in order that no other memorial might secure this particular location.

I had an interview with Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library, and after an explanation to him of the situation he, on December 18, 1916, reported the House joint resolution 145 without amendment, and submitted a report (Rept. No. 881) thereon. See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 18, 1916, page 505.

The date, however, was too near the end of the session, and the resolution amended, as reported by Senator WILLIAMS, remained on the calendar unacted upon.

Mr. LINTHICUM has, at my request, introduced at this session a similar resolution, a copy of which I herewith inclose, and on Saturday I appeared before the House Committee on the Library and secured a prompt and unanimous approval of the resolution.

May I ask that you kindly introduce a similar resolution in the Senate and have it referred to the Committee on the Library and secure for me the privilege of appearing and explaining before that committee the situation. If this resolution can be placed upon the calendar, to be taken up later, it may save the memorial to the Government, because Mrs. Johnston's will states that if a site on public grounds is not secured before July 2, 1918, the fund will lapse.

Yours, very truly, LAWRASON RIGGS.

I will state, in this connection, that I introduced that joint resolution in the Senate and it has been favorably reported and is now on the calendar.

It is to be noted that this memorial to one of the Nation's former Presidents was designed by Mr. Hans Schuler, an artist of fine reputation; that his design meets with the entire approval of the Commission of Fine Arts and is of undoubted artistic merit; and that the memorial shall be of absolutely no expense to the Government.

Indeed, the resolution itself provides that the memorial may be erected in the southern portion of Meridian Hill Park and that the design and location of said memorial, and so forth, shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of said memorial.

House joint resolution 70 is precisely identical with Senate joint resolution 49, introduced by me, and which was reported favorably without amendment by the Committee on the Library on January 18 last.

I earnestly recommend and ask that the House joint resolution now on the Senate calendar be passed by the Senate in lieu of the identical Senate joint resolution heretofore favorably reported, as I have said.

I regret there is any hesitation on the part of Congress in accepting this memorial and in designating a plot of ground on which it may stand in Washington.

What possible reason can the Congress of the United States have sufficient to justify rejecting that which is virtually a gift, and a princely gift, made to the Nation; made by one of the most cultured and gifted women our land has produced? The terms upon which the gift is offered are undoubtedly dignified and befitting the donor and the great people to whom she has offered this appropriate memorial, designed and conceived by a native-born artist of great distinction. What ground is there to justify the Congress of the United States in offering an affront to the memory of a man who was in his time the choice of the majority of the electoral vote of this land and of a plurality of the people for President of the United States? Is it now to be said by Congress that a former President, long dead, is not fit to have an artistic memorial erected through the loving generosity of an American woman placed in a comparatively obscure public park? His contemporaries, who knew him best, deemed him fit to have the place of places in the White House. Let Congress refuse him this slight token of nominal, national respect, besmirch his memory, the memory of a former President of the United States, and you affront those who put him in the President's chair. We at once stigmatize him and them as unfit, and advertise throughout the world, struggling as never before to attain the ideals of democracy, that the Congress of the United States stamps the results of free elections, the rule of democracy, as a failure. Otherwise, how could a man so unfit that his very memory, even at this late day, is studiously and officially insulted and his acts still reprobated, have been elected President of the United States?

But for the fact that an abortive effort was made at the other end of the Capitol to defeat this resolution and that I have heard that efforts may likewise be made in this Chamber to defeat this resolution, I should feel that I had done a gross injustice to the Congress of the United States to suggest the possibility that any Member could so far forget the influence of the example of this Republic among nations and the dignity of the presidential office that he would deny to former President Buchanan a few feet of ground as a site for a beautiful memorial gift to the Nation from a lovely woman, and proclaim to the world a belief, happily shared by few, that a man elevated by his fellows to the Presidency could be so black, so utterly unfit.

His critics say that President Buchanan was not opposed to slavery and believed in State rights. In his day and for many years before so thought the majority of the people of this country, and their Representatives in this body voted in harmony with such views. As well censure the greatest and wisest men, the founders and makers of this Nation, Washington, Jefferson, and hosts of others, who owned slaves. Buchanan ought not in justice to be judged by the present-day standards, which have advanced long since to the point that they condemn without reserve the institution of slavery, but rather in justice he should be judged according to the moral and political standards of his own day.

In his day judges, theologians, and statesmen in the best sense, men of the purest lives, of the highest ideals, justified the institution of slavery, now properly, and, fortunately, universally abominated. Curiously enough, however, good men of that time did not see and did not believe as do we. Witness the blood of my own nearest and dearest friends, which was spontaneously and freely offered between 1861 and 1865 as a sacrifice for principles they, as well as Buchanan, believed right and just and worth dying for. We see so clearly now they were wrong, and died for causes that, while mourning them, we do not attempt to excuse. But surely they were honest and noble and conscientious, and ought not to be condemned. Nor should he.

They acted according to their best light. Before Buchanan was elected, and even between 1857 and 1861, when he was President, this country, or the majority of the people in this country, were distinctly apathetic to the moral horror of slavery. It was regarded simply as a political and economic problem, except by the comparative few. Rare were the men of the Sumner, Garrison, and Phillips type, who opposed slavery vehemently and unselfishly as a moral wrong on moral grounds. Such men were generally classed as radical fanatics, and no man classed as a radical fanatic by the mass of his fellows ever has been or ever will be elected President.

The platform of 1856, on which Buchanan ran, defeating Pierce and Douglas for the nomination, declared in effect:

That Congress must not meddle with slavery in the States, the Territories, and the District of Columbia, and recognized the right of Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the fairly expressed will of the majority, to favor constitutions with or without slavery, and to be admitted to the Union.

And on that platform he was elected by a plurality vote over the opposing candidates, Fillmore and Gen. Fremont.

Undoubtedly, Buchanan's views were then the views of the masses of our people else he could not have been elected on such a platform, and we can not indict our whole Nation as morally wrong and unfit for holding views that accorded with their conscience.

Consider, too, for a moment, as further evidence of the sentiment and conscience of those times, the historical fact that in 1856 Seward was rejected by the Republican leaders as an impossible Republican candidate against Buchanan. And why? Seward was too radical to hope for popular approval because he demanded the abolition of slavery here in the District of Columbia, the seat of government, and the repeal of the fugitive-slave laws. His colors, mild enough as we see them to-day, were then considered too revolutionary for presidential timber.

Surely no one on either side of this Chamber can or will accuse Lincoln of beliefs unworthy of a patriot, yet we find that Lincoln, in the course of one of his debates with Douglas at Ottawa, Ill., took very conservative ground, and said:

I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.

And at Freeport he stated, as reported:

Gladly would I see slavery abolished in the District of Columbia, but not unless it was done gradually, with the consent of a majority of the qualified voters and with compensation to the owners of the slaves.

Slavery was surely then no great shock to Lincoln's moral sense; and at that very time Buchanan was President.

What radical and rapid changes developed in Lincoln's convictions when in time he reached the point of signing the emancipation proclamation not long thereafter.

Like the "white slave" question, the control of the use of narcotics, the buying of votes, the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in this generation, opinion on the slavery question in Buchanan's time was rapidly changing, always progressing apace.

As to secession—Horace Greeley, the ablest editor of his century, said editorially in the New York Tribune as late as February 23, 1861, that if the cotton States "choose to form an independent nation they have a clear moral right to do so"—an opinion far in advance of any Buchanan held or expressed on the "right" of secession. So that Buchanan was not far removed in his views from distinguished and honored men.

I recite these well-known and perhaps trite quotations and facts, not for the purpose by far of fanning old fires, but solely to prove that the public sentiment, the public conscience, has advanced a long way, and to recall only for an instant the backward state of public opinion, the public conscience, existing in Buchanan's time, as we are too apt to lose sight of the distance the world has traveled since 1861.

It is well that for a moment we consider what principles good, holy, patriotic men could, and did, honestly believe in during that generation; and Buchanan's views were certainly as sincere and pure and, perhaps, in advance of the overwhelming majority of his contemporaries.

What more can be expected, except of a superman?

Buchanan was confronted with enormous difficulties when President. Mexico then, as recently, was a source of deepest concern; likewise Cuba. Every indication pointed to a disruption of the country, to a civil war, that any President must have strained every nerve and energy, compromised in any honorable way, to avoid. Imagine the responsibility! Imagine anyone, whatever his ability, postponing indefinitely, much less averting entirely, that strife! Omnipotent power, omniscient skill alone could have warded off the Civil War. Of course Buchanan made mistakes. Anyone would. Of course he failed. Anyone would. Of course he displeased and disappointed many people, many powerful factions. Anyone would. Of course he was subjected to vile, harsh abuse. So was Washington, and so, indeed, was every President.

But none can say he did not act in good conscience, from pure motives, and in accord with the moral standard, the idea of law and rights that then obtained among the majority of the American Nation.

He did that which his conception of his oath, the law, and his duty required of him always.

Mr. Buchanan was not the greatest of our Presidents, nor yet the least. In patriotism, moral character, and intellect he measured above the average by far. His perplexities were terrible. We are not just if we censure him for failing where no finite genius could succeed, as we now well know.

It seems curious to think that the people of the section I, in part, represent, who suffered most in material things and in the shedding of blood from the Civil War—and lost—want to forgive without reserve and want to forget entirely the bitterness, the sorrow, the mutual mistakes of the period immediately preceding the War of 1861–1865, and that those who won seem barely satisfied to let those sorrow-burdened years be forgotten and apparently take pleasure in reviving old hates, old prejudices.

The policy of denying this, a rather commonplace, conventional compliment to a former President because he incurred certain antebellum hates, now over 60 years old, and that ought to be both dead and buried, seems to be shamed by the immense unity that now inspires our country to combine in a present-day struggle wherein past schisms lose identity and our all goes into the common cause.

It seems paltry and unworthy, with our boys in camp and our Army fighting in Picardy, Lorraine, and on the Marne, to tarry for talk over Sherman's march to the sea or the surrender at Appomattox, much less to think for a moment of the mistakes, the tears, and misunderstandings that preceded the war and arrayed on the one side men like Grant and the other Lee. Both, if alive, on this very day would be shoulder to shoulder, their genius pooled, in the fight to protect the world and to defend the United States.

Slavery, secession—both dead! Why not let the discussion of the painful memories, the dark history of their period, die?

Why not remember merely that Buchanan, like every President, was part and parcel of his times—and he was a good deal better than the conscience of his times, which is about as good as anyone ever is—that he was President of a great Nation, that his office is entitled to respect, and that he is entitled to respect, however mistaken though his views, gauged by present-day ideals, may have been?

Mrs. Johnston, his niece, a philanthropist, who has endowed a great hospital in Baltimore for the treatment of little, suffering children and also helpful in other charities, honored and respected Buchanan. Her philanthropies, however, were not in Baltimore alone. She did many other philanthropic acts, among which is included the presentation to the Smithsonian Institution of her large and magnificent collection of paintings to form a nucleus of a national art gallery. She was the hostess and mistress of the White House during his administration. No man who was unworthy could have held until death the love and respect of a woman of such culture and intellectuality. Why deny to her the opportunity to pay this last service affection bade her pay to the memory of her beloved uncle?

Few men in America have done what Buchanan did for his country. From 1814 until 1861 he was in public life. He served in the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1814. For 10 years he was a Representative in Congress, and in 1832 he was appointed an envoy to Russia by President Jackson, and rendered signal service in negotiating a commercial treaty with that country. He sat for three terms in this Senate, and declined the Attorney Generalship of the United States, offered him by President Van Buren. He served with success and distinction as Secretary of State under President Polk, and was appointed our minister to England by President Pierce. His was a long, honorable, and most useful career. Never in all his long political life did the breath of scandal touch him. Only for his openly held and courageously expressed political views was he assailed.

To permit this contemplated memorial to President Buchanan can not in any sense, in any quarter, be construed as an indorsement of the views of the majority during the fifties, which were his views on slavery. Those views, potential enough then, are dead now. Nor by denying the erection of this memorial can we express any censure that can affect any living being. Surely it is poor sport for this body to condemn the conscientious official acts of a man so long dead, and when no proper purpose can be served.

By defeating this resolution would we do more or less than reflect upon the good sense, the forgiveness, the unified patriotism of this body? And say to the listening foreign peoples a thing they will misconstrue, to be an admission that our democracy is a fraud; that the people kept James Buchanan 46 years in public service, and in 1856 elevated him to the highest place; that the Senate in the wiser generation of 1918 repudiated his long public service, turns aside to heap posthumous insult upon him, despises his memory, brands him as unfit to share with hundreds of soldiers, statesmen, and lesser folk the honor of a public memorial in the Capital where he served his best.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had no idea until about half an hour ago that this question of the Buchanan statue was to come before the Senate. I have objected to this measure being taken up by unanimous consent, but I did not know it was to be pressed to a vote, and I have had other and graver things to occupy my mind and thoughts than the preparation of an elaborate discussion of the record of James Buchanan. It is necessarily a historical question. I should like to have time, if I could, to prepare what I desire to say in a reasonably condensed form and submit it to the Senate; perhaps quite uselessly; I do not know that I can do anything to prevent its passage, but I wish to enter my own protest, and I think that is a privilege the Senate will not be disposed to deny me. If, however, I am compelled to go on now I will do the best I can; but it will inevitably protract the debate, because I have to use books, and I can not condense offhand.

I feel personally rather strongly on this subject. Statues remain; they remain for the future generations to look at.

I should like as a preliminary to say one or two words with regard to some suggestions made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I do not oppose a statue of James Buchanan because he was a southerner or Confederate. He was neither. If he had been either I should have had greater respect for him than I have now. I am not opposing him on account of his friendship for slavery, hostile as I have always been to those who thought as he did.

I should be the last, Mr. President, to do anything to revive the differences between the South and the North during the Civil War. However widely I differ from the views of the statesmen and soldiers of the South, no one has ever heard me in the Senate reflect upon their motives, or do otherwise than give them the personal praise which I thought their due. It is not on account of Mr. Buchanan's southern sympathies; this has nothing to do with the South; nothing to do with the Civil War. That he was one of the weakest of our Presidents, nobody, I think, will deny. I am opposed to setting up a statue to James Buchanan in a Capital City where there is no statue to the elder Adams, who signed the Declaration of Independence and the treaty of peace of 1782, who risked his life in the cause of the American Revolution; no statue to Thomas Jefferson, no statue to his great opponent Alexander Hamilton—I mean a statue out of doors in the city—no statue to James Madison, one of the makers of the Constitution; no statue to James Monroe, the author of the doctrine which has gone throughout the length and breadth of the world; no statue to the younger Adams, who helped to formulate the Monroe doctrine and who vindicated the right of petition in the House of Representatives. In a city so destitute of proper recognition of some of our great Presidents and great leaders, to erect a statue to James Buchanan seems like a reflection on the memory of every one of those really great men.

I know this bill happens to come before us owing to the legacy of his niece, a most admirable woman in every respect. That she should feel affection for her uncle was most natural; that she should leave money to build a statue to him in Washington is equally natural and wholly laudable; but when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] suggests that because Mr. Buchanan retained the love of his niece he therefore should have a statue in Washington in a public park, seems to me to be going rather far.

Benedict Arnold retained, if I remember correctly, the love of his wife and the affection of his children; but I think that is hardly an argument for erecting a statue to his memory in Washington, on the ground that he was beloved by his own family, and that it is a time when we should allow old differences to die. It is what the man stands for that is of importance. Benedict Arnold has stood throughout all our history for treason in its worst possible form. Therefore no American would think of erecting a statue to him. We forgive André, young and gallant, risking his life, as Nathan Hale did, as a spy in the interest of his own country and the cause for which he fought, but we do not forgive the traitor, and we do not raise a statue to him in order to say to future generations and to the children who come after us that the men we select to whom to raise statues are the men of doubtful loyalty. I agree with the Senator from Maryland that this is a time when every section and all people, no matter what their opinions have been in the past, should be united; but that is not the question here.

The foreign nations, about whom the Senator from Maryland is disturbed, will not concern themselves in the least about a statue to James Buchanan in the city of Washington. The large, overwhelming mass of the people in foreign nations probably never heard of him, and those who are familiar with our history and have written upon it have what, I think, is the generally accepted opinion in regard to him. This is a time above all others when every one of us is called upon to show the utmost loyalty to his country. We demand it from everybody. This joint resolution proposes at this moment, in the midst of this war, to erect a statue to the only President upon whom rests the shadow of disloyalty in the great office to which he was elected.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, this resolution was introduced two years before we had anything to do with this war.

Mr. LODGE. That makes it no better. Age can not justify disloyalty. It does not make any difference when this joint resolution was introduced. The argument was made here this morning that this was a time for loyalty. If we erect this statue at all, we are going to erect it, with all its disloyal associations, in the midst of a great foreign war, when we are appealing to our people for loyalty.

I repeat that the proposition is to erect for the admiration of our children in coming generations a statue of the one President upon whom the dark shadow of disloyalty rests. It was not that he was loyal to the South. He had no part in the misfortunes of the South or the war of the South; he did not suffer with them; he did not die with them; he did nothing. He was not a southerner; he was a northerner. As I have already said, had he been a southerner and had he fought for the other side, I should have hesitated long before I said anything.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who does me the honor to listen to me, will perhaps remember what I said on this floor in regard to the late Senator Daniel after his death. They were kind enough, I believe, to put some words of mine on the statue of the great soldier and Senator when it was erected, and those words illustrate my feeling toward the men of the South who fought the war. That is a different thing. Buchanan fought no war. He was elected President of the United States, and was sworn to defend the great charge put into his hands. He did not defend it; he did not protect it.

The best thing that can ever be said of him is that he was weak; but a very large proportion of those who are familiar with the history of the time believe, as I shall later attempt to show, that he was not only weak but that he was also disloyal.

Mr. President, contrast him with Andrew Jackson, one of the great figures of the Democratic Party in our history, with whose political principles I, brought up in another school, profoundly disagree. Andrew Jackson was not the opponent of slavery; I think he was a slave owner. He was not a friend of the protective tariff; he was a staunch, thoroughgoing Democrat in all principles of the party of that day.

But when the hour came, when there was opposition to the Government of the United States, of which he was the head, sworn to protect it, sworn to uphold it, no man was truer to his trust than Andrew Jackson. He defied South Carolina; he would not permit the thought of nullification; he put an end to the incipient resistance to the United States at that time; in other words, he was a loyal man. I differ from him as widely in his general political principles as it is possible to differ, but when it came to the question of loyalty to the Government of which he had been made the head there was no hesitation on the part of Andrew Jackson. That was not the attitude or the action of Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. President, I should like very much if this joint resolution could be allowed to go over and I could be permitted to present the historical side of it which I intend to present in some way, in a condensed and moderate form, so that I need take no undue time of the Senate. I believe I can justify fully all I have said, but I must have time to do it and to get it into proper form. If, however, I am compelled to go on now I will go on as best I may, but my remarks would be very hasty and would involve a great deal of reading from authorities.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, so far as I am concerned I dislike to refuse any request that may be made by the Senator from Massachusetts, but this joint resolution has been on the calendar, I think, since January. It has been brought up in the regular order three or four times when called on the calendar and has been objected to. The money which has been given for the purpose of the erection of this memorial lapses on the 1st of July, and, so far as I am concerned, I feel that the Senator from Massachusetts is thoroughly able to say what he may desire to say on this matter without further delay.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President, if the intention is to refuse on this joint resolution the ordinary courtesies of the Senate, I will proceed. The joint resolution, however, never came over here from the House until the 21st of February. I am not aware that every Senator on this floor is always prepared to debate every bill on the calendar to which he happens to object.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say that I took occasion to speak to the Senator this morning——

Mr. LODGE. The Senator spoke to me five minutes before the resolution came up.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Five or ten minutes. I did not think it was necessary to say that, because I took it for granted that the Senator was able to defend his opposition to the measure whenever he saw proper. I think this House joint resolution has been on the calendar since February 22, 1918.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I said.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. But there was another joint resolution on the same subject on the calendar at an earlier date than that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator refers to the Senate resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I refer to the Senate resolution, which was reported January 18, 1918.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland at that point if he is prepared to speak now on every bill on the calendar?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. No, sir; but I take it for granted, Mr. President, that the Senator is prepared to speak on this question, for the reason that I talked with him two months ago in regard to the matter and tried to dissuade him from opposing this measure; in fact, I had two talks with him soon after the resolution was reported, and he told me that he was going to speak against it, and I took it for granted that he was prepared and is prepared. I think it unfair to ask that this joint resolution go over any further, for the reason that there are only a few days before the time elapses in which the money can be used.

Mr. LODGE. The money can be used up to September.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Yes, sir; but the appropriation has to be accepted by the Government and the site selected for the memorial in order that the money may be used.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the legacy does not lapse until the 1st of September.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It lapses on the 1st of July.

Mr. LODGE. The House report, which I looked at the other day, states that it lapses in September.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It lapses on the 1st of July. I have already read a letter from Gen. Lawrason Riggs, in which he gave the date at which it lapses, which is July 2, to be exact.

Mr. LODGE. Then the House report which I read is in error.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I presume it is. Gen. Riggs writes me as follows:

If this resolution can be placed upon the calendar, to be taken up later, it may save the memorial to the Government, because Mrs. Johnston's will states that if a site on public grounds is not secured before July 2, 1918, the fund will lapse.

Mr. President, I think that this matter has been before the Senate long enough. As I have said, the resolution has come up in the regular order on the calendar three or four times, and each and every time there has been objection to taking it up. I know, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, that he has had it in his mind to oppose this matter, because he told me soon after the joint resolution was reported that he intended to oppose it.

Mr. LODGE. Of course I intend to oppose it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. And I take it for granted that he has had full time to prepare himself.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, Mr. President, if the Senator chooses to take that method——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. In one moment. If the Senator from Maryland chooses to take that method, I venture to say that it will not quicken the passage of the joint resolution. I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland if, when the unfinished business comes before the Senate, this matter will end?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That will have to be determined at 2 o'clock; I do not know.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator is making no progress with this joint resolution by the course he is pursuing. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will withhold that for one moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Iowa withhold his point?

Mr. KENYON. I withhold it.

Mr. LODGE. Simply to show that I was not mistaken, I hold in my hand the House report, from which I quote as follows:

Under the terms of Mrs. Johnston's will, the bequest of $100,000 for a monument to President Buchanan will revert to the estate if no provision for the erection of the memorial shall have been made by September, 1918.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I think that the trustee ought to know, and the trustee says that it lapses on July 2, 1918.

Mr. LODGE. I do not question that the Senator is correct. I merely read from the House report to indicate that the friends of the proposed statue had better agree about their dates.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I think there is a mistake about that; for, unless a site is selected in Washington, D. C., before July 2, 1918, the money which has been provided for this memorial lapses.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Kendrick	New	Smith, S. C.
Curtis	Kenyon	Norris	Smoot
Dillingham	King	Page	Sterling
Fall	Knox	Pittman	Sutherland
France	Lenroot	Poindexter	Thompson
Gallinger	Lodge	Ransdell	Tillman
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard	Trammell
Gulon	McKellar	Shields	Underwood
Hitchcock	Martin	Smith, Ariz.	Vardaman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BORAH, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. WARREN answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is still not a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the order by which the Sergeant at Arms was directed to request the attendance of absent Senators be rescinded.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Maryland is determined to show neither mercy nor courtesy, I am compelled to go forward in my own way and bring forward as best I can the historical authorities—it will be very awkwardly done—as I talk.

I wish to restate, as Senators have come in who were not here when I began, that this statue is to be erected on Meridian Hill. We have there a park of 10 acres, bought by the United States Government, which cost nearly $500,000. In proportion to its size I think it is probably the most expensive park in the world. A great deal has been spent on it since. A great deal more will have to be spent on it in order to make the surroundings decent. It is a park that will be little used, for it is not in a crowded quarter of the city, but it is desired to ornament it for the benefit of the neighborhood; and when the Senator from Maryland, as a part of his argument, suggested that it is a rather obscure place to put the statue of Buchanan, I agree with him. It is rather obscure, and that, of course, is a merit so far as it goes; but that is one purpose of the statue, and the ornamentation of that park is one of the strong reasons why it is being pressed on the attention of Congress. That park has had powerful friends. It required powerful friends to secure $500,000 from Congress to buy 10 acres of land wholly unsuitable for park purposes. The money for the statue, of course, is furnished by Mrs. Harriet Lane Johnston, a woman who commanded the admiration and respect of everyone, and whose affection and loyalty to the memory of her uncle is worthy of all praise.

I have tried, and I will not go over the ground again, to point out that the question involved in this statue has nothing whatever to do with the Civil War or with the division between the North and South or with Mr. Buchanan's opinions on slavery—nothing whatever. I would not even rest the opposition to it on the ground that he was one of the weakest of our Presidents.

That is admitted even by his friends. It is the excuse they give for what he did; and, as a broad, general proposition, to erect a statue to a man merely because he happened to be the weakest of all our Presidents seems an insufficient ground. My principal interest in this thing is that Mr. Buchanan was elected by the American people to the greatest office in their gift, one of the greatest offices in the world; that his one overmastering and overpowering duty was to defend that Government against all comers, to maintain it as it was handed to him; and in that he failed, and all the world knows it. The excuse given by his friends is that he was well meaning, but weak; and though that may be an excuse, mere possession of good intentions does not seem to be a wholly satisfactory reason for raising a statue for after ages to admire and wonder at. The other and very general belief—I think a pretty well-settled belief, and one which I hope in due time to demonstrate from the history of the country sufficiently—is that he was not loyal to his trust; that his weakness amounted to disloyalty. It was the universal belief at the time. The South did not trust him, and there was no reason why they should, at that critical moment.

The North absolutely did not trust him. He was compelled by mere force of public opinion to change his Cabinet in order that he should have in his Cabinet men who, whatever their politics, were known to be loyal to the Government, which Mr. Buchanan was sworn to defend.

Mr. President, I have sent for various books relative to that time, and I am sorry to be obliged to weary the Senate by picking out the passages here which I desire to cite as proving my case when I could save the Senate a good deal of time if they would give me a day or two to do it at my house or at my office; but as the Senator from Maryland prefers that I should do it in this way, I shall try to do it.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes. The House has passed the Senate bill with four amendments. Three of these amendments are changes in phraseology. I think they might be properly so termed. The first substitutes "an act to amend an act entitled" for "an act as amended." The war-risk insurance laws grow out of two main acts, the act passed in 1914 and the amendatory act of 1917. In the bill which the Senate passed we referred to the provisions in the amendatory act of 1917 as provisions of the act of 1914 as amended. The House changed that language and referred to it as the act of 1917 and an act to amend the act of 1914. They simply describe the act in a somewhat different way.

Their next amendment is to use "October 6, 1917," instead of "September 2, 1914, as amended," changing their mode of referring to the same measure.

Their next amendment strikes out two provisos, leaving the language really with the same meaning that it would have if neither of the two provisos was in the act.

Their fourth amendment is a new section. It reads:

SEC. 11. No person of draft age physically fit for military service shall be exempted from such service on account of being employed under the terms of this act.

I am not in favor of changing the general rules applicable to the draft law which, under certain circumstances, exempts men from military service.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator read that new section again?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

No person of draft age physically fit for military service shall be exempted from such service on account of being employed under the terms of this act.

Mr. NORRIS. What class of people does that apply to?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was just going to say that I am opposed to provisions of this kind. I think that the general rule of exemption under the draft age should not be changed by special legislation of this character, but should be broad in its effects, and if the exemptions permitted under the general draft act would take out of the service temporarily men employed under this act they should be taken out of it. But I have consulted with members of the Vocational Board and they tell me that none of their employees will come under this provision, and they do not think this particular provision would affect their work at all.

Mr. NORRIS. It would then have no effect whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will have no effect; so I do not object to it in this act, although I was explaining the reason why I did not object to it—that it is because I do not think it will have any effect.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, what is the act referred to?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is the act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. The language the Senator has read applies to employees under that particular act?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under this act only.

Mr. NORRIS. And if they have no one within the draft age it will have no effect?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They have none, and it is not contemplated they will have any. They stated that their assistants would be of ages greater than the draft age, and they expressed the view that they did not object to this provision. I object to provisions of this kind, but I do not think it will have any unfortunate effect in the present instance, and after consulting with several members of the committee, those who were on the floor yesterday, I was requested by the committee to move concurrence in the amendments of the House.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me? I came in while the Senator was speaking. Is this the soldiers' vocational law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is.

Mr. NELSON. And this amendment is simply to exempt civilian employees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the amendment provides that its civilian employees shall not be exempted if they are of draft age.

Mr. NELSON. I understood it to be exempting civil employees connected with this board.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read to the Senator the provision:

No person of draft age physically fit for military service shall be exempted from such service on account of being employed under the terms of this act.

Mr. NELSON. That is exactly the way I understand it—that no man liable to draft physically fit for military service shall be exempted because he is employed in connection with this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is it.

Mr. NELSON. I heartily approve of it. It is a good plan.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say that after conferring with members of the committee we desire to ask the Senate to accept the amendments put on the bill by the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to say that in the War-Risk Insurance Bureau in the Treasury Department there are men employed now of draft age?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. This bill does not apply to employees of the War-Risk Bureau. These men will be the employees of the Federal Board for Vocational Education engaged in rehabilitation work among injured soldiers. They have none of their force under the draft age, and they do not contemplate selecting any of their force under the draft age. They can select their force entirely outside of those who are subject to military service, and therefore they do not object to this provision at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there would be any within the draft age myself. Therefore it seems to me it would be nonsense to put in this provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think there was any necessity for it, but I do not think there is any harm in it, and therefore I intend to move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has not been handed down from the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to Senate bill 4557.

Mr. SMOOT. For the RECORD I should like to ask the Chair if the House bill has yet been presented to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives upon the bill. It will be read:

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 4557) entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," do pass with the following amendments:

Page 1, line 12, after "entitled," insert: "An act to amend an act entitled."

Page 1, line 14, and page 2, line 1, strike out "September 2, 1914, as amended," and insert: "October 6, 1917."

Page 4, line 5, after "hereof," strike out all down to and including the word "act" in line 11.

Page 8, after line 21, insert:

"SEC. 11. No person of draft age physically fit for military service shall be exempted from such service on account of being employed under the terms of this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a question of order. Can the amendments be considered at this time with the unfinished business pending?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a message from the House and is therefore in order to be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The rule specifically provides for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in order to be laid before the Senate, but not to be considered. It seems to me that the unfinished business ought to be temporarily laid aside. If the Senator from Maryland is willing, and I trust he is, to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business until the Senator from Georgia has the amendments concurred in, I think it ought to be done.

Mr. LODGE. I object to laying it temporarily aside because I know——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator can not object for the reason that the suggestion has not been made.

Mr. LODGE. I would object if the joint resolution for the Buchanan statue is to follow.

Mr. GALLINGER. No one has suggested that the Buchanan joint resolution is to follow.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, after the sort of treatment I received this morning I have grown suspicious.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has had two years to grow suspicious over this measure.

Mr. LODGE. A man does not can a speech two years for a bill on the calendar. This joint resolution has been on the calendar since February 21.

Mr. GALLINGER. This bill has been on the calendar for two years, I will say to the Senator. I voted to put it there two years ago.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The rule provides that—

The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate, any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

I move to concur in the House amendments. We can dispose of the matter in a moment, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts what day he would suggest when he would be ready to debate House joint resolution 70?

Mr. LODGE. I will be ready to go on with the matter on Monday. I am ready to go on now if the Senator insists, but I would go on in a very awkward, time-consuming way. However, I shall do the best I can.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Then the Senator would be satisfied if the joint resolution is taken up on Monday. At what time?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is in charge of the measure, and it is for him to take it up when he can, and get it through after the Senate has debated it. If the plan is to set appropriation bills aside in order that we may erect a statue to James Buchanan, I hope the country will know it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I say to the Senator no proposition of that character has been made yet.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. It has not been suggested.

Mr. LODGE. Then why do we not go on with the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. We will probably do so, but I wanted to see if we could come to some terms in regard to the time when the Senator from Massachusetts would be prepared to make his speech.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be better prepared on Monday than I am now.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he give notice that at the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday he will move to take up the joint resolution and let the matter go over until then.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. If that is satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts, it is satisfactory to me, and I shall make that motion.

Mr. LODGE. I have no opinions to express about it. I am ready to go on right now, and I will be ready to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Then I will make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not necessary to make a motion now.

Mr. LODGE. It is merely a notice.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I give the notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, in the midst of the strife and turmoil of the world's greatest conflict of arms, when men of our race are called upon to give their lives that the great principles of Democracy may continue to live for the freedom and safety of the people of the world, we are compelled to face a proposal to change fundamentally the organic form of our Government and to establish precedents that may ultimately lead to the entire overthrow of the form of government that has fostered our Nation and protected our people ever since George Washington was first inaugurated President of the United States.

An amendment has been proposed by the Congress, and submitted to the States for ratification or rejection, so changing the Federal Constitution as to allow the National Government to exercise the power to police the several States in all matters relating to the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors.

A resolution is now pending in the Senate of the United States, which has already passed the House of Representatives, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which partially takes away from the States the power to establish and regulate by local enactment the privilege of voting in the several States. This resolution may be passed and the question involved submitted to the States for ratification or rejection during the session of the present Congress.

At this time I do not intend to discuss the questions of prohibition or woman's suffrage on the primary issues involved, but will confine myself to the graver question as to whether the surrender of great powers to the Federal Government by the States is in contravention of the fundamental principles of constitutional government as understood and agreed to by the Thirteen Original States in their desire to form a more perfect Union and at the same time to preserve for themselves and their children the blessing of a free government, the assurance of domestic tranquillity in the management of their local affairs, and the certainty that the personal liberty of the citizens of the States would not be destroyed by the Federal Government.

These principles are protected and preserved in and by virtue of our dual form of government. It is just as vital to the preservation of the Union and all it stands for that the reserved rights of the States should be maintained in all their original power and integrity as it is to vitalize and develop within its proper sphere the powers delegated to the central government.

I ask you to bear in mind that no government can or will remain free unless it possesses the unrestricted right to levy taxes for its maintenance, to prescribe the terms on which the electorate may exercise the privilege of voting for officers, and the unrestricted right to police its own governmental territory in regard to all matters that immediately affect the lives, the liberty, and the property of its citizens. In my judgment the proposed amendment would seriously impair and jeopardize these great powers as now controlled by the people of the several States.

At the very birth of the Nation the first and most vital question to all was the preservation of the local rights of the people in the States. Even with all the restrictions placed in the Constitution to assure and preserve local self-government, the fear that a centralization of power might destroy the local governments created such antagonism as to seriously jeopardize the adoption of the Constitution, and even then its ratification was not secured except with the express understanding that the first ten amendments should be approved as a bill of rights for the protection of the people.

In a clear and convincing paragraph Justice Brewer has expressed the sentiment of the people in insisting on these additional guarantees of their liberty. He said:

The first ten amendments to the Constitution, adopted, as they were, soon after the adoption of the Constitution, are in the nature of a bill of rights and were adopted in order to quiet the apprehension of many, that without some such declaration of rights the Government would assume, and might be held to possess, the power to trespass upon those rights of person and property which by the Declaration of Independence were affirmed to be inalienable rights.

Are those principles less "inalienable rights" now than they were in the beginning? That is the real question that confronts the American people in the consideration of the proposed amendments.

The Tenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States clearly defines the dividing line between the powers that may be exercised by the Federal Government at Washington and those powers that continue to be exercised and controlled by the several States. This amendment declares:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the several States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Let us now consider what powers were directly granted by the States to the Federal Government and then we may clearly understand the powers that were reserved to the States. Our relations with foreign nations and all questions involving the safety and national defense, the regulation of commerce between the several States and with foreign countries, a uniform system for the collection of taxes at the customhouse, and the establishment of a Federal judiciary were directly conferred upon the Federal Government. All questions relating to the suffrage, the local police power, the laws relating to marriage and divorce, the inheritance and disposition of property, in fact practically all questions that directly related to the lives, the liberty, and the health of the local community were retained by the States for their determination and enforcement.

Mr. Harry St. George Tucker, in his work on Woman's Suffrage, clearly defines the dividing line between national and State control. He says:

The words "local self-government" are not, as is supposed by many, mere words to conjure with; oftentimes invoked by politicians, because of their hoary and honorable lineage, to lead the people into devious and slippery paths. These words had their origin in the profoundest political philosophy. They are the answer which free government makes to the oppressed. They are the response that liberty makes to tyranny. They are the guaranty of the safety of the home, the recognition of the trusteeship of man as the defender of the home and the guardian of its sacred precincts. They single out the individual, arm him with the greatest political power that can possibly be given to an individual, and hold him responsible for its exercise in the development of home and neighborhood; and thus is demanded at his hands the exercise of the highest and most sacred duties that can ever be the portion of an American citizen.

In the last analysis just laws should be the reflection of the combined sentiment of the people who must live under them and who must adjust their lives to them. Much of the law that is found on the statute books to-day originated in the customs of the people and the necessities that confront them in their daily lives. Men recognize that the custom of a local community has behind it an element of justice in the dealings between man and man and in order that justice might prevail they enacted custom into law and provided penalties for its violation. Consider how difficult it would be to establish the law of custom in a country that extends its territory from the ice-clad hills of the North to the tropical seas of the South; that reaches 3,000 miles across a continent that embraces fertile fields and arid deserts, treeless prairies and virgin forests, snow-capped mountain ranges and the impassable quagmire of the river bottoms, agriculture feeding industry and manufacture supplying husbandry, unlimited mineral resources and boundless fisheries, areas possessed of unrivaled transportation facilities and regions where communication is practically impossible. A country possessing almost every variety of climate, soil, and crops that the world can produce; a Nation under whose flag every race of man abideth and every civilization is represented. A people whose religious views are as far apart as are the civilizations of the Occident and Orient. A new people reborn in a new world out of the prejudices and passions, the virtues and talents of the contending civilizations of the ages that have passed, with every habit of life, every standard of living, and every moral attitude that man can possess. Is it within the range of the possible that such a people could establish law by custom and usage that would reflect their wishes and maintain their principles?

Is any one so bold as to assert that the representatives of these people assembled at Washington can enact laws about local conditions that will reflect the high ideals, the common needs, and the imperative necessities of all these people, that must have the breadth and scope of the Nation to rest upon?

It was not thought possible of attainment in the beginning when we were a homogeneous people and it certainly is not possible of accomplishment when multiformity is our pervading characteristic as a people. The customs that were crystallized into law in Minnesota would work oppression to the people of Texas. The laws that may be necessary to preserve the integrity of our civilization in Alabama would probably prove offensive to the people of Maine. The Federal Government can not enact a law for one State and a different law for another State. The legislation passed by the Federal Government must be uniform and applied with geographical uniformity throughout the Nation.

Let us suppose that the State governments were abolished in their entirety and the entire power to legislate was concentrated in the Government at Washington, and that the Congress of the United States attempted to pass uniform legislation in reference to marriage and divorce. Is it at all probable that the national legislation would prescribe racial distinctions in legalizing the marriage relations? If it did not, what effect would its failure to do so have on a State that has maintained for half a century laws prohibiting miscegenation in order to protect the integrity of the white race?

In some portions of the United States there is great scarcity of timber. Undoubtedly it would be beneficial to the people living within these States to pass laws encouraging the growth of timber and penalizing the destruction of forest growth. On the other hand, there still remain portions of the United States where great forests occupy fertile fields that men are anxious to clear in order to build homes and develop the country. It must be apparent to all that a uniform law passed by the Federal Government could not be written that would work out the ends of justice and satisfy the people living in communities which have as different surroundings as those I have just described.

Woodrow Wilson once wrote:

> The United States are not a single, homogeneous community. In spite of a certain superficial sameness which seems to impart to Americans a common type and point of view, they still contain communities at almost every stage of development, illustrating in their social and economic structure almost every modern variety of interest and prejudice, following occupations of every kind in climates of every sort that the Temperate Zone affords. This variety of fact and condition, these substantial economic and social contrasts, do not in all cases follow State lines. They are often contrasts between region and region rather than between State and State. But they are none the less real and in many instances permanent and ineradicable.

I might proceed for hours, giving illustrations of laws that might be passed that would be entirely satisfactory to one community and work out the ruin and destruction of another. It must be clear to all that the preservation of the power of the local people to govern themselves about their local affairs is as necessary to the maintenance of the integrity of the National Government as the exercise of the power granted to the Federal Government in dealing with strictly national affairs.

The wisest statesman of his day, the author of the Declaration of Independence, once said:

> I believe the States can best govern our home concerns, the General Government our foreign ones. I wish, therefore, to see maintained that wholesome distribution of powers established by the Constitution for the limitation of both, and never to see all offices transferred to Washington, where, further withdrawn from the eyes of the people, they may more secretly be bought and sold as at a market.

Nowhere in America has the principle of local self-government been more thoroughly ingrained into the hearts and minds of the people than in the New England States. The town meeting grew out of colonial conditions and the desire of the first settlers to establish local laws to protect the morals, health, and happiness of each local community. It is a part of the very soil of New England. An attempt to tear it out would be resisted to the last degree, and yet, under the enthusiasm of a great moral endeavor or under the desire to find and establish a universal right that is more theoretical than actual, many of our best citizens would establish precedents that open the way to tear down all the principles that protect the people in the exercise of their local government and the management of their domestic affairs.

The people of the South should remember that the loyalty of the people of the North to the great principle of local self-government, as taught them and their fathers in the town meetings of New England, stood as a bulwark of strength to protect the South and lead it away from the hand of the oppressor in its hour of greatest need. Yet when the situation is reversed we are asked to prove ourselves recreant to the very principle that preserved our racial integrity.

Let me again call attention to the prophetic words of Thomas Jefferson directly relating to the question of local self-government and worthy of the thoughtful consideration of every man in this hour of national distress and danger.

In his autobiography he said:

> It is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected. Were not this country already divided into States, that division must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. Every State is again divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minuter details; and every ward into farms, to be governed each by its individual proprietor. Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread. It is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be best managed for the good and prosperity of all.

I can hear now those who contend for a strong Federal Government; those who would yield the power of local self-government but once because they desire to force a condition on other people who disagree with them, answer all I have said by the statement that the pending amendments do not destroy the State governments entirely, do not vest all the power in the Federal Government at Washington, that the new authority given to the Federal Government is limited in its scope and effect and is intended only to carry out a specific purpose, there intended to halt and that the arm of oppression will go no further.

To them I say they must not forget the history of the past. Governments rarely fall in a day. The slow process of disintegration has marked the downfall of nations. It is the history of the past and we can not with safety close our eyes to it. Yield the fundamental principles that have protected the national life for more than a century under which we have grown great and powerful, under which we have developed the highest civilization known to the history of man, and you will undoubtedly bring into our midst errors of government and dangers of administration that have not beset our paths in the past and were guarded against by the founders of the Constitution.

President Wilson, in his book on Constitutional Government in the United States, says:

> It would be fatal to our political vitality to strip the States of their powers and transfer them to the Federal Government. It can not be too often repeated that it has been the privilege of separate development secured to the several regions of the country by the Constitution, and not the privilege of separate development only, but also that other more fundamental privilege that lies back of it, the privilege of independent local opinion and individual convictions, which has given speed, facility, vigor, and certainty to the process of our economic and political growth. To buy temporary ease and convenience for the performance of a few great tasks of the hour at the expense of that would be to pay too great a price and to cheat all generations for the sake of one.

Shall we cheat the generations of the future in their priceless inheritance of government in order that ease and convenience may be regarded in the consideration of the grave matters proposed for adoption by the constitutional amendments?

You may contend that the ideals you seek are in the interest of good government, but do not forget that good government at its best often is not a substitute for self-government, and that it is far better that each community should be allowed to develop its own experiments and pay the penalty for its own mistakes rather than lack the power to initiate, for only in this way can it obtain the high ideals of citizenship.

You must allow every community absolute freedom of action if you intend to endow it with the freedom of growth. We must intrust every local problem to the determination of the citizenship of each local community if in the end we desire to obtain just, fair, and enduring laws. I know that there are some even in this enlightened day and time who still believe that after all a benevolent despotism is the best form of government, but there are not many of these people living on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and most of them fight beneath the banners of the autocratic power that seeks to control the destinies of the world.

President Wilson, in an address to the New York Press Club, said:

> Liberty has never come from the government. Liberty has always come from the subjects of it. The history of liberty is a history of the limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it.

A few days before, at the "Workman's Dinner" in New York, President Wilson said:

> When we resist, therefore—when I, as a Democrat, resist the concentration of powers, I am resisting the process of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human energy.

Will not the people be warned before it is too late against the direct efforts to take away their liberty by the concentration of powers in the Central Government?

Where can you find a more exalted example, productive of the accomplishment of high ideals, than where you find a strong, virtuous, and independent people, master of their own lives and building for themselves; each community the reservoir of its own future greatness and the constructor of its own destiny? Wonderful training camps for the future growth of the Nation these local communities become. Can we doubt the future greatness and virtue of our people if we remain true to the teaching of our fathers and loyal to the great principles on which the foundations of the Republic rest? Remember always that one sovereign people can not and must not rule over another.

Lest you forget, let me recall what our democratic fathers taught in the beginning. Man in his individual entity is the controlling unit of any community that desires development and progress. His personal liberty is the source of his personal initiative and is the foundation of the power and development of the State. All progress made in the unfolding of our resources and the creation of national wealth depends more upon the individual liberty of the citizen than upon all other causes combined.

Liberty has higher ends to attain than to stir the heart to action and to win high political results. Liberty is not a means to an end. It is the end itself. No higher political end can be achieved than to endow a people with all the blessing that freedom of thought and action must of necessity bring to them. Liberty nourishes self-respect, self-reliance, and all the impulses of a higher and a greater life. It is the birthplace of learning, literature, and art. It is the source of all the higher impulses and aspirations of men. On the contrary, a centralized, usurping government directs the energy and intelligence of its people away from the higher ideals of life and turns their attention to foreign politics, dazzles them with the desire for military glory, and destroys their aspiration for liberty. With our sons fighting for the great principles of democracy, surely the importance to our country of preserving the integrity of our local governments, as the only bulwark that will assuredly protect our liberty at home, justifies a discussion of the political danger that confronts us and makes defensible an appeal to the sturdy manhood of America to withstand the insidious attack that now threatens the integrity of their State governments.

A united and free government at Washington is assured for all time, but the rights and liberties of the people can be preserved only through the independent sovereignty of the States. If you would remain assured as to the vital principles of our Republic, the preservation of the States in all the completeness of their independence and power must remain with us for all time to come.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I merely wish to take a moment of the Senate's time. I desire to state that the best answer to the argument that has been made by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is that the amendment providing for woman suffrage stands upon the same footing with every other amendment to the Constitution which has been submitted to the States for ratification. The proposed amendment can not go to the States until a joint resolution providing for its submission shall have been passed by a two-thirds vote of both Houses. Then it does not become operative until it shall have been adopted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. It in no way abridges or interferes with the rights of the States to enact their laws. All that it does is to give to the women of the country, who are taxpayers, who are property owners, who are as well educated as are the men, who attend the same schools and colleges, and who are entitled to, and should be given, equal rights with the men—it gives them a voice in all the questions which are presented to the States that affect their property and their rights and in which they are as deeply interested and concerned as are the men.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I desire to say, although I thank him for listening carefully to the address which I have just made, that he entirely misinterprets it. I have not at all contended that we may not modify the Constitution or amend it; that it is not possible for the people to do so. My argument was directed to the fact that there was a certain form of government which has been established preserving certain powers to the local governments in the States. You may take that away from them by constitutional amendment. If you had the votes, you might establish a monarchy in this country; you might establish an absolute despotism; but because you might have the power to do so if you had the votes would not at all contravene the fact that you were overthrowing the government which was established by the fathers in the beginning.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Constitution was adopted and provision was made for its amendment. This amendment is being presented in the regular way, and our form of government is in no more danger because of its submission than it would be because of the submission of any other amendment. The argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would be applicable to any amendment to the Constitution which in any way might affect any so-called State rights.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, two days ago I gave notice that at the conclusion of morning business I would to-day submit some remarks to the Senate regarding our difference with the Republic of Colombia and express some reasons why, in my judgment, a treaty of amity should be concluded with that country. The business of the day, however, has been of such a character as to make it inconvenient for me to take the floor for that purpose, and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], having charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, seems to think that he may be able to have the bill passed this afternoon. I shall not, therefore, stand in his way, but shall content myself with delivering on some future occasion such thoughts as I have upon the subject to which I have referred.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the conferees have agreed as to every item in the bill; in fact, there were no items in the bill that provoked any particular discussion in conference except amendment No. 23, which relates to pneumatic tubes. Every other item has been agreed to, that amendment alone being in disagreement. I move that the conference report be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if I understood his statement as to what the report contains. Do I understand that all the amendments in disagreement between the House and the Senate have been agreed to with the exception of one?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is right.

Mr. SMOOT. And this conference report is simply a partial report?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is right.

Mr. SMOOT. And the question of the tubes goes back to conference?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator knows that I have no opposition to his motion at all. I am in favor of it, but I wish to say a single word in connection with the pneumatic-tube question, which is in disagreement between the two Houses, about a matter which has come up and which was mentioned in the other House yesterday.

The New York Tribune published an article or a dispatch from Washington—I do not know which—which casts reflections upon my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] of the gravest character. I need not say to the Senate, which knows him and knows him well, that there is no man of higher honor or more unblemished integrity or finer character than my colleague, who represents with me the State of Massachusetts, and the statement of the New York Tribune in regard to him was a slander of the basest kind and one that ought never to have been made, because the facts have been brought forward before and entirely explained.

I desire to read a brief letter which Senator WEEKS wrote to Mr. Reid, editor of the New York Tribune:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington D. C., June 13, 1918.

O. M. REID, Esq.,
Editor The New York Tribune,
154 Nassau Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. REID: I desire to call your attention to an article which appeared on the fourth page of the Tribune this morning relating to the American pneumatic-tube situation. I do not take this action to call attention to the numerous exaggerations and errors in the article—such as the statement that the purchase was to cost ten or eleven million dollars, when the maximum amount recommended by the tube commission, to which reference is made, was $4,427,000, to be reduced to such an amount as the Interstate Commerce Commission might determine—or to the connecting of Mr. John E. Mulholland with the New York, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis tube systems. The information before the commission was to the effect that he had no interest whatever in the tubes located in those cities.

But what I wish to particularly call your attention to is the reference made to the firm of Hornblower & Weeks, of which I was a member until I entered the Senate, and to myself. The slightest investigation or inquiry on the part of your Washington correspondent would have demonstrated the absolute unfairness—in fact, untruthfulness—of the statement made, and I can not refrain from entering my protest against such references and attacks as are made against me in this article.

The facts are that in 1916 a list of the stockholders in the American pneumatic-tube service was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that list showed some stock standing in the name of Hornblower & Weeks, but an investigation which I made at that time demonstrated that the stock belonged to a customer of the firm and that the firm itself did not and never had owned a share of the company's stock. The same statement is true of every member of the firm and of myself. I do not now and never have had the slightest interest in this company and yet I am exposed to the public as a member of a commission and a Member of the Senate urging the adoption of a report relating to a company in which it is charged I have financial interest or that those formerly connected with me and in whom I would naturally have some personal interest have a financial interest. The unfairness and unrighteousness of such an accusation without any attempt to investigate its truth must appeal to you, and I trust that you will take such action as seems to you fair to correct the impression which the article in your paper has given.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN W. WEEKS.

Senator WEEKS left the firm of Hornblower & Weeks after he was elected to the Senate and has had no connection whatever with it for six years. The firm never owned stock in the company, as my colleague suggests in his letter, and he never had any stock or interest in it in the remotest way. It is hardly necessary for me to say to the Senate, which knows him and knows him well, that he is a man utterly incapable of taking part in or urging legislation which affected anything in which he had the slightest financial or personal interest.

Mr. MARTIN subsequently said: Mr. President, I came into the Senate while the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was alluding to some imputations that had been made against his colleague [Mr. WEEKS]; and while I realize that he needs no defense, and perhaps there is no occasion for me to say anything, my natural impulse is to say something; and I can not let the opportunity pass without saying that I concur in the fullest and broadest sense with all that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said about his colleague. Senator WEEKS in his service in this body has established a reputation that can not be broken down by irresponsible newspaper statements or statements of any kind. His personal and his official integrity are beyond reproach, and I know nothing could be done that I would not do in vindicating him from any attack that might be made upon his personal or official integrity. I do not believe there is a man in this body who is more devoted to his official work or possesses a higher integrity, personally and officially, than Senator WEEKS, and I simply desire to express my opinion and bear testimony to that effect now while the matter has been alluded to in the Senate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment numbered 23, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the Chair to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. HARDWICK, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, line 2, after the word "assembled," to strike out:

That the following sums are appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that they are sufficient therefor and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, but the amount to be paid from the Treasury of the United States shall in no event be as much as one-half of said expenses, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, except amounts to pay the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of said District, of which amounts one half is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, namely:

And insert:

That one half of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have here a copy of a letter written by the President of the United States to Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance, on the question of woman suffrage, which is now before the Senate; and I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, as bearing on this question, and which I believe is the strongest statement yet from the President on this subject. The sentiment therein expressed will aid materially in the consideration of the suffrage amendment, which I hope will soon be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have just had a vote of the Senate upon the question of putting letters of this sort in the RECORD. The letter has already been published, I suppose, in nearly every paper in the United States; and the Senator from Kansas knows that just a few days ago we had four or five pages of the RECORD filled with petitions and letters upon this subject. I can not see what earthly good can come from having the RECORD encumbered with letters of any kind, because it is not going to influence a vote in this body; and I hope the Senator will not ask that that letter be put in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw any objection to the printing of this letter. If he insists on the objection, I shall be obliged to read it. In view of the fact that this is a letter from the President, I think the Senator from Utah ought not to make any objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator appeals to me on the ground that it is a letter from the President of the United States I will say no more and let it go in the RECORD; but I do not believe it is right.

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well. I think it is entirely proper, and very pertinent at this time, and the best help we have had for woman suffrage for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. OWEN subsequently said: This morning there was introduced in the RECORD a letter from the President answering a memorial of the French Union for Woman Suffrage, transmitted to him by Mrs. Catt. In order to make the RECORD clear the memorial itself and letter of transmittal ought to be attached. I ask unanimous consent to have that done. I hope no one will object to it because it is to make clear the RECORD; otherwise the President's utterance is not perfectly clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. No; let it go in.

There being no objection, the letter and memorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 7, 1918.

MRS. CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT,
President International Woman Suffrage Alliance.

MY DEAR MRS. CATT: May I not thank you for transmitting to me the very interesting memorial of the French Union for Woman Suffrage, addressed to me under the date of February 1, last? Since you have been kind enough to transmit this interesting and impressive message to me, will you not be good enough to convey to the subscribers this answer?

I have read your message with the deepest interest, and I welcome the opportunity to say that I agree without reservation that the full and sincere democratic reconstruction of the world, for which we are striving and which we are determined to bring about at any cost, will not have been completely or adequately attained until women are admitted to the suffrage, and that only by that action can the nations of the world realize for the benefit of future generations the full ideal force of opinion or the full humane forces of action. The services of women during this supreme crisis of the world's history have been of the most signal usefulness and distinction. The war could not have been fought without them or its sacrifices endured. It is high time that some part of our debt of gratitude to them should be acknowledged and paid, and the only acknowledgment they ask is their admission to the suffrage. Can we justly refuse it? As for America, it is my earnest hope that the Senate of the United States will give an unmistakable answer to this question by passing the suffrage amendment to our Federal Constitution before the end of this session.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 13, 1918.

To His Excellency PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On behalf of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, as well as on behalf of the suffrage associations of France, Great Britain, Belgium, Italy, and Portugal, for whom we transmitted a memorial to you asking for a message to the world upon the subject of woman suffrage, I express most grateful appreciation for your letter of June 7.

Particularly do I want to say that your strong stand for the early passage of the Federal suffrage amendment is of both national and interfational import as a renewed guaranty to the world that America is indeed and in truth fighting for democracy.

But two parliaments since the beginning of the war have pronounced against woman suffrage. These two are those of Germany and Hungary, while the parliaments of several of our allies have either given or promised the ballot to women. Surely the United States Senate can not longer stand with our enemy countries in this matter of fundamental democracy.

Your message will give courage and hope to the women of our allied countries, who are bearing such tragic burdens in this titanic struggle for freedom, and it is a continued gratification to suffragists in this country to know that we have a loyal friend in the White House.

Sincerely, yours,

CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT, President.

NEW YORK.

Union Française pour le Suffrage des Femmes. Address de la présidente: Paris, 14 Rue Pierre-Charron; secrétariat: Paris, 53 Rue Scheffer.

PARIS, February 1, 1918.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE PRESIDENT: In the historic message which announced to the world the entry into the struggle of American force and thought, you declared unforgettable formulæ upon which your great Republic awaits a victory—the right of peoples to self-determination and a durable peace for generations to come.

The French suffragists and those of the allied countries have heard your beautiful and strong words and they unite in prayer to you for the accomplishment of the following resolution:

"Considering that from this war there has come a new international right, founded upon the right of peoples to self-determination;

"That nothing can be claimed to speak authoritatively in the name of the people which excludes women from the life of nations;

"Considering, moreover, that women during the actual conflict have shown the value of the social work which they are capable of performing;

"Considering that the participation of wives and mothers in the suffrage would be the greatest guarantee of the peace to come, the need that the belligerent countries have of their help in the present conflict, the sufferings, moral as well as physical, which this war has cost them, have given definite proof that no longer, without iniquity and imprudence, can one refuse to give them through their vote an influence in the undertakings which decide peace and war:

"The women of the allied countries express the wish that President Wilson, in one of his future messages, will proclaim the principle of woman suffrage one of the fundamental rights of the future."

We have read with emotion in the Woman Citizen, Mr. President, the very profound words which you have spoken in response to the delegation of women from New York. If we recite them here it is because they are the same words that we would ask you to address to all humanity in one of your declarations which resound throughout the world.

It is a struggle which goes deeper and touches more of the foundation of the organized life of men than any struggle that has ever taken place before, and no settlement of the questions that lie on the surface can satisfy a situation which requires that the questions which lie underneath and at the foundation should also be settled, and settled right. I am free to say that I think the question of woman suffrage is one of those questions which lie at the foundation.

I beg you to accept, Mr. President, the expression of our great appreciation of our American sisters and our profound admiration for the high moral tone of the declarations which you have uttered in their name. It is this which encourages us to ask your aid, which will be a powerful influence for women suffrage in the entire world.

For the committee of the Union Francaise pour le Suffrage des Femmes, and in the name of the other national committees, of which the list is joined hereto.

DE WITT SCHLUMBERGER, President.

Vice presidents de l'Alliance Internationale du Suffrage des Femmes, Jane Misme and Marie Louise Le Verrier; secretary, Cecile L. Brunschvicg; treasurer, Marguerite Desavis; secretary, Marguerite Pichon Landry; secretary, Suzanne Grinberg.

This memorial was signed by the suffrage associations of Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy, and Portugal.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who desire to be present when the District of Columbia bill is considered, and therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The lack of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Chamberlain	King	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Kirby	Page	Smith, S. C.
Dillingham	Knox	Pittman	Smoot
France	Lodge	Poindexter	Thomas
Gallinger	McCumber	Ransdell	Thompson
Gronna	McKellar	Sheppard	Trammell
Guion	McNary	Shields	Underwood
Johnson, Cal.	Martin	Smith, Ariz.	Vardaman
Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Kenyon	Norris	Smith, Md.

Mr. KIRBY. The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent on official business. I should like the RECORD to show this announcement.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] on public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. TILLMAN answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.
